Low expectations at talks

Officials skeptical of breakthrough in London

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — It appears unlikely that the stalemated Middle East peace process will spring into motion any time soon.

As U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright prepared to hold separate meetings in London this week with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, both American and Israeli officials were downplaying expectations of a breakthrough.

Indeed, as Albright arrived in London to prepare for the meetings, the U.S. State Department spokesman, James Rubin, said Albright was not optimistic about bridging differences between the two sides.

Rubin said Albright's pessimism was based on preliminary reports by telephone from U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross, who was in the Middle East last week to talk with the two sides prior to the London meetings, and from Vice-President Al Gore, who tried his hand at peacemaking during a visit to mark Israel's jubilee.

Nor was there much optimism emerging from Israel, which along with the Palestinian Authority has been reiterating the same positions for months.

The talks have been stalled for some 14 months. The Palestinian Authority broke off negotiations with Israel after infrastructure work began for a new Jewish neighborhood at Har Choma in southeastern Jerusalem.

Three ensuing Hamas suicide bombings of Israeli targets in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv dealt a further blow to hopes of bringing Israel and the Palestinians back to the path of trust and compromise needed to give substance to the Oslo accords.

At a joint news conference with Gore, Netanyahu said the gaps between the Israeli and Palestinian positions were "considerable."

During his conversations with Netanyahu, including a surprise two-hour session Sunday before he travelled on to Egypt, Gore failed to convince the Prime Minister to accept a reported American proposal for Israel to redeploy from an additional 13 percent of the West Bank in exchange for specific Palestinian steps to crack down on terror.

Israel's 50th celebrated at Night of a Lifetime

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With the sounding of the ram's horn, with music, song, dance, pomp and circumstance, Toronto's Jewish community celebrated Israel's 50th birthday at The Night of a Lifetime last week.

An overflow crowd of 10,000 people jammed into the National Trade Centre at Exhibition Place to join in worldwide celebrations marking Israel's jubilee.

They were treated to a Hollywood-style extravaganza that included cantorial chanting, Israeli pop music and modern dance. The multigenerational crowd celebrated, with many spontaneously taking to the open areas of the massive trade centre and turning them into impromptu dance floors during the uptempo numbers.

The program also included numerous videos of Canadians and Israelis reminiscing about various aspects of Israeli history and society.

Israeli entertainer Yoel Sharabi was a hit with his enthusiastic, upbeat renditions of Israeli songs, as were the three tenors – cantors Paul Kowarsky, Benjamin Maissner and Yaakov Motzen.

The speeches from a host of political and community dignitaries were mercifully short. Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, who was mobbed by swarms of well-wishers when he entered the building, drew the most enthusiastic applause when he stated: "There can be no peace without a secure State of Israel."

The prime minister recalled the abiding relationship between Israel and Canada through the Jewish state's first 50 years, noting, "Ours is a friendship based on the shared values of freedom and democracy; on the thousands of people-to-people contacts that link us intimately with each other; and on the vibrant Jewish Canadian community that is one of the building stones of Canada's identity."

Quoting Israel's late prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, "and ordinary people throughout the region," Chrétien said they have had "enough of blood and tears.

"Peace, true peace, is not only the absence of war, it is the presence of understanding," Chrétien said. "True security comes not from the threat of arms, but from the promise and hope of dialogue. That is why we admire the courage that so many Israelis are showing: putting aside old grievances, resisting the old habits of mistrust, working to break the cycle of violent provocation and retribution.

"Ladies and gentlemen, the bond between Canada and the people of Israel is a strong one. It is based on shared democratic values. It has been forged in friendship, mutual respect and decades of working together. And I know it will grow stronger still when – someday very soon – the people of Israel and those throughout the Middle East, will enjoy the blessings of a lasting peace."

"We are celebrating a milestone that must have once seemed like a faraway dream... Israel's achievement's [in 50 years] have been nothing short of miraculous," Ontario Premier Mike Harris said.

Others to address the celebration were Murray Koffler, who, along with his wife Marvelle, served as

Israel's 'forgotten soldiers' honored at commemoration

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On the eve of celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary we must remember the soldiers who gave their life for that country, said a 1948 war veteran.

"We must especially honor the forgotten soldiers – those who were taken into the army immediately upon their arrival in Israel and then lost their lives before they could see the country of their dreams," said Eugene Feiger.

He spoke following a flag processional at the recent Yom Hazikaron commemoration and Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration sponsored by Bnei Akiva of Toronto, Emunah Women of Toronto and the Mizrachi Organization of Canada.

Feiger told the capacity crowd at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation that these soldiers were often the only survivors in their family. "There is no one left to grieve for them – they are truly the forgotten soldiers," he said after lighting a memorial candle.

Special guest at the celebration was Kadish Goldberg, who made aliyah 37 years ago and is now a resident of Kibbutz Tirat Zvi.

A retired teacher, he now writes and translates poetry. He presented My Fair Sabra at 50, accompanied by Gary Levine and Bnei Akiva Choir under the the direction of Dr. Harvey Erlich, with music by Heshy Kuhnreich of Zemer Orchestra.

The committee for the commemoration and celebration included Samuel Kapustin and Jerry Rosenfield, co-chairs; Rabbi Roni Barnea, Chagit Barnea, Ehud Estreicher, Marsha Kapustin, Eli Poch and Howard Wolfe.

Yom Hazikaron a time to 'remember sacrifices'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 200 yahrzeit candles in memory of the thousands of fallen Israeli soldiers flickered in the lobby of the Pride of Israel Synagogue, and an honor-guard of young men bearing Israeli flags stood at solemn attention, as members of the community filed into the sanctuary for the recent Yom Hazikaron assembly.

An estimated 1,000 people attended this event held to commemorate the Israeli soldiers who died in military operations or in terrorist attacks.

Organized by the Consulate General of Israel, Toronto, in conjunction with the Israel at 50 Committee, the bilingual program was a mix of prayers, readings and songs. Yehuda Marle, Hashomer Hatzair shaliach, was the Hebrew MC while Irit Waidergorn, Israel's deputy consul general, provided most of the English translation.

The ceremony began with Taps, followed by a short march of the honor guard, mainly members of Tzabar, the Israeli scout troop.

Tzippi Erez, who lost her father, uncle and husband in military operations, lit a symbolic yahrzeit candle. Cantor Charles Weinberg chanted K'El Maleh Rachamim. Kaddish was said by Nir Bareket, who lost his brother, a member of the Palmach, in 1947.

Jehudi Kinar, the consul general of Israel, said Yom Hazikaron is a time to remember "the sacrifices made by so many for younger generations... They did not die in vain. They have contributed to all our well-being."

Coming on the eve of Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations, he said, Yom Hazikaron is always a difficult time for Israelis. "It's a time to think of our loved ones;" and those people who have not lost family members share the sorrow. "At this time we belong to one big family."

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich reminded the assembled group that with its many accomplishments, it may look as if the State of Israel came easily, but it was built on "blood, sweat and tears of our people... [the fallen soldiers] paid a terrible and awesome price for what we enjoy today... We respect their eternal gift."

Marle and Waidergorn listed the number of casualties in each of Israel's wars.

Shula Ofir, the aliyah shlichah, another key organizer of the event that also included the participation of local musicians, told The CJN the group had worked together for several weeks to prepare a special Yom Hazikaron ceremony for Israel's 50th anniversary.

The singers, musicians and readers included Jewish National Fund representatives Yaen Vered and Dubi Dekel, David Brant, Meytal Golan, Orli Albalak-Botzer, Dafna Tzur, Lori Grafstein, Yitzhak Argeman, Yisrael David, Reuven Zemer, Shimon Zer-Avi, Mitch Silverstein, and Jordana Balas.

Security review of Zundel continues

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Supreme Court of Canada last week turned down Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel's request that it review a Federal Court of Appeal decision that permitted a security review to continue.

The High Court gave no reasons for its decision but the result is that the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) will be permitted to hold hearings to determine whether Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) was correct in labeling him a security risk.

A native of Germany, Zundel has recently sought Canadian citizenship. His request prompted the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to ask CSIS to conduct a review to determine whether Zundel poses a security risk to Canada. If so, he would not be eligible for citizenship.

CSIS's finding was reviewed by SIRC, but Zundel challenged SIRC's impartiality, saying it had already branded him a hatemonger in a 1994 report on the white supremacist Heritage Front.

A lower court agreed with Zundel but that decision was overturned by the Federal Court of Appeal.

Meanwhile, a Canadian Human Rights Commission tribunal has rejected Zundel's submission that it end a hearing into whether a computer Web site, called "Zundelsite," promoted hatred against Jews.

The decision came shortly before a Federal Court judge was asked by Zundel's lawyer, Doug Christie, to rule on a parallel motion to throw out the case. Federal Court Judge John Richard has reserved his decision.

The tribunal, hearing a complaint against Zundel, ruled "there is no jurisdictional impediment to completing our task." The tribunal noted there was no court order to stop and that the public interest favored a continuation of proceedings.

The case is set to resume on May 11.

Toronto Jewish students help complete their Torah

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Toronto's Jewish day and supplementary students witnessed a mitzvah last week: the completion of a sefer Torah they helped write.

Over 1,000 Jewish students packed the auditorium of Associated Hebrew Day School's Kamin campus auditorium to witness the completion by a sofer (scribe) of a Torah.

The joyous event capped the Toronto Youth Sefer Torah Project, probably the biggest project linked to the city's Israel at 50 celebrations, short of last Thursday's Night of a Lifetime bash.

A procession that included hundreds of students carried the Torah from Netivot Hatorah Day School on Atkinson Avenue in Thornhill, past Leo Baeck Day School next door, and up the street to Associated.

There, students representing 12 branches of Toronto and York Region day and supplementary schools watched as sofer Yaakov Cohen meticulously inscribed the final letters onto the parchment, using special ink and a traditional turkey feather quill.

The auditorium then erupted into joyous singing and dancing.

"I know of no other community to have done this," remarked Julia Koschitzky, chair of Toronto's Israel at 50 celebrations.

It is a mitzvah to write a Torah at least once during one's lifetime, said Associated's Jerry Rosenfield, who spearheaded the project.

But there will still be one more step: seven of the students have been chosen to travel to Israel to meet Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and present the Torah to the IDF.

The project began when Mizrachi commissioned the writing of a sefer Torah to be presented to the IDF to commemorate Israel's fallen soldiers.

Jewish students across the Greater Toronto Area were asked to "subscribe" to individual letters in the Torah. Over 4,000 students responded.

Each subscriber will receive a special certificate to recognize their contribution.

The project was sponsored by Toronto's Zieleniec, Markowitz and Jelinek families in memory of Simcha Zieleniec and Alexander Jelinek.

The lucky students chosen to go to Israel will leave May 10.

They are scheduled to meet Netanyahu on May 11 and to present the Torah to the chief rabbi of the IDF on May 14.

New policy on war criminals expected soon

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The federal government is expected to announce sometime in the near future, perhaps as early as this week, a "comprehensive policy" on dealing with both Nazi and modern day war criminals, The CJN has learned.

Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit that deals with Nazi suspects, said the minister has indicated a desire to merge the units, but that the move hasn't been approved.

Vickery said it would be premature to comment further but Randy Gordon, former project manager of the modern day war crime unit, said the move is designed to increase the efficiency with which modern war criminals are removed from Canada. Because it is easier to win cases against modern day war criminals – less time has elapsed and legal criteria are easier to meet – merging the units will permit the government to "point to modern success and divert criticism on the Nazi side."

The unit investigating modern war crimes has only three program officers in the office and a limited budget. "That's why I think the Justice Department is trying to convince the cabinet that if the government is serious, here's the cost – $45 to $48 million a year – and it will get better results," he said.

Gordon speculated there are more than 400 cases of modern day war criminals in Canada, many of them among the 20,000 refugee claimants whose cases have yet to be heard.

"I think they'll unite the units eventually," said Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' war crimes committee. "But it's premature now."

He said Congress was concerned that such a merger would divert resources from the effort against Nazi war criminals. "We're anxious to go after modern war criminals, but not at the expense of Nazi war criminals. Since there's a time limit with regards to Nazi war criminals, we should act there first," Abella said.

Gordon, who retired in October, was highly critical of the Justice Department's efforts to remove Nazi war criminals and the lengthy time it takes to remove even those who have been found to have lied to obtain Canadian citizenship.

In addition, a September 1996 cabinet memorandum to amend the Criminal Code to permit successful criminal prosecutions of alleged Nazi war criminals "is sitting on some desk," he said.

In other developments:

• Nazi collaborator Mamertas Rolland Maciukas of Montreal left Canada last week rather than contest allegations that he obtained his citizenship by fraud. Vickery said Maciukas departed 1½ days before his citizenship was revoked by cabinet. Maciukas was a member of a voluntary Lithuanian police battalion that helped German forces murder Jews.

• Wasily Bogutin has been notified that cabinet is in the process of stripping him of his citizenship after a Federal Court Judge ruled he had lied about his wartime activities in Ukraine.

• Ladislaus Csizsik-Csatary, a former member of the Royal Hungarian Police, has left Canada rather than contest allegations he was involved in confining and deporting Jews to concentration camps in 1944. Following inquiries by the RCMP and Immigration officials, "we're satisfied at the moment that he has left the country," Vickery said.

• The trial of Helmut Oberlander, who allegedly served as an interpreter for an Einstatzgruppen killing squad, is set to begin on Aug. 24 in a Federal Court in Toronto.

• The trial of alleged war criminal Johann Dueck, allegedly involved in the execution of Jews in Ukraine, will begin on Oct. 6.

By Dec. 1, all current cases involving alleged Nazi war criminals will be before the courts, Vickery said.

KOLEL REACHES OUT TO THE DEAF

The lecture series that took 50 years to create.

The events of Israel's first 50 years have led up to this lecture series, but the issues of the next 50 years will be the subject matter. Having achieved relative security and prosperity during its first half-century, Israel must now decide what kind of society it wants to be.

To explore these issues, the New Israel Fund is sponsoring a lecture series, Yesterday's Dreams, Today's Challenges, across North America.

In this series, diverse leaders and scholars from Israel and North America will explore the complex challenges that the Jewish State faces in the next 50 years, and the ways that North American Jews can help to meet these challenges.

Sweet celebrations

In every community where we live, Jews last week celebrated Israel's 50th anniversary. And what sweet celebrations they were. Whether in the privacy of our homes, where we gathered with friends to exchange good wishes and say a l'chaim, or publicly, where we gathered by the thousands in social halls and theatres, to listen to music, dance, sing, and even shed a soft tear, it was undeniably a wondrous and wonderful occasion for us all.

Forgotten, for the moment at least, were the intra-communal divisions that in defiance of history's obvious lessons, appear to be driving wedges where bridges should be. For the most part, we were united in our gratitude and in our joy.

In many communities, it should be noted, the anniversary last week was not the culmination of our celebrations, but rather the beginning. More parties, school programs, assemblies, dinners, songfests, carnivals and special commemorative moments are planned for the coming months.

We urge our readers to attend them wherever and whenever possible.

To the countless individuals, professional and volunteer, in all the communities who played a role, and continue to play a role in helping bring about our celebrations, we convey our deep appreciation and say, simply, thank you.

Last week was indeed so very sweet. But what was sweetest of all was the knowledge that, in so openly, so fervently and so lovingly celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary, we have helped to plant the occasion forever in the minds and hearts of our children.

Good Canadian initiative

Little noticed last week, during the course of these anniversary celebrations, was the opening by Canada of a diplomatic office in Ramallah and a grant of $7 million in aid to the Palestinian Authority. The timing of the initiative aside, the government did a good thing.

All efforts by the international community to improve the economic and social conditions of the Palestinians are to be commended and encouraged. The generation of Palestinian children who were encouraged by their leaders to reject the authority of their parents, to throw stones, riot and rampage on the streets, rather than accept the discipline of learning in school to try to acquire skills and strive towards self-improvement, is an aimless cohort of young adults who dwell in poverty. And this is dangerous for Israel.

Despair is poverty's chief companion. And the offspring of both is almost always a three-headed monster: nihilism, extremism and fanaticism that revels, in this case, in attacking individual or group inclinations for tolerance and coexistence with the Israelis.

Thus any attempt to diminish the extent of Palestinian poverty is welcome. The more that daily life holds out the possibility of some measure of economic prosperity and personal fulfilment for individual Palestinians, the greater the incentive to support the peace process, and thus, the better the chances that peace will actually result.

Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy expressed the matter very succinctly: "Our aim is to demonstrate that the pursuit of peace is in the interests of all the people in the region. It starts on the ground with being able to show people that there is some hope, some concrete improvements they can see coming as a result of the process that's going on."

Against the backdrop of the Canadian initiative, it was therefore very disheartening, but not, alas, surprising to read that Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin had paid a visit to Iran where he called for the continuation of the "armed struggle against Israel."

Yassin is determined to fight his religious wars against Israel. But in his fanatical determination to destroy the Jewish state, he is ensuring his own people's perpetual penury and consigning yet another generation, at least, to live in unrelieved despair.

CJN stories on eating disorders ended loneliness

I would like to thank you for having a very informative column on eating disorders. I am a 19-year-old girl in the process of recovering from anorexia nervosa. Reading about other girls who went through the same problem made me feel really connected to them. I used to think I was the only religious girl going through this because it is not something spoken about openly in the frum community. I only hear about anorexics in the non-Jewish world; so I thought there was something wrong with me for becoming anorexic. I was able to identify with the many examples that were given, and only then did I realize how prevalent this problem is in the Jewish community. I just wish that Montreal would have as many resources as Toronto.

I am in the midst of getting help, mainly because of the people around me who care about me. Yet my parents are very frustrated and although they do see progress, it is hard for them to understand why it is taking me so long to get better. Anyway, I would just like to thank you for being very informative on this topic, and many others.

Editor's Note: In publishing this letter without attribution, we are departing from a long-standing CJN policy. However, given the circumstances, we feel justified in making this exception.

Backs Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon

We believe that it would be helpful to the interests of peace in the Middle East region if Canada would join the Americans and others in recommending to the Lebanese government that they accept Israel's offer to withdraw from its security zone inside Lebanon.

This of course would be predicated on a clear commitment by the Lebanese to fulfil their security responsibilities and not permit that territory to be used as a base for attack on Israeli northern communities.

Received cordially at the Vatican

I had the same experience in September 1944 while attending Yom Kippur services in Rome for Jewish (Allied) servicemen. I went into the Vatican with several others, including three Jewish army chaplains, two from the United States and one from Britain.

We were received cordially, and the rabbis had a private meeting with the Papal Nuncio, who became the pope later on. I was in the Royal Canadian Air Force.

A year earlier I was at a synagogue in Tunis, North Africa, for Yom Kippur.

Objects to letter on Vatican statement

There are enough real problems tearing at the Jewish world, yet there are no shortage of activists ready to fire away at the non-Jewish world with their provocative and oftimes misleading statements. I refer to a letter (CJN, April 2), written by Bert Raphael on behalf of the Jewish Civil Rights Foundation of Canada, which is in fact an invective against the Vatican for its statement, We Remember: A Reflection of the Shoah.

This statement resulted from the initiative of Pope John Paul II, who is sincerely horrified over the events of the Holocaust and shamed by the historic loathing of the Jews propagated throughout most of Catholicism's history. Through his nurturing, the Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews was established to examine and explore ways to improve upon the strained relationship that has hitherto existed.

However, the Vatican statement fell short in its contrition and went out if its way to exonerate Pope Pius XII. Those rabbis who participated in the dialogue with the Vatican, including our own Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, were disappointed; they expected something less evasive. The consensus is that fundamental compromises were made to pacify those in the Catholic hierarchy who could not bear to have Pope Pius XII and Christ's Church stigmatized.

Other rabbis, who did not participate in the Catholic-Jewish dialogue, welcomed the statement despite its shortcomings, because for ages there has not been anything as respectful to Jews emanating from the Vatican.

Bert Raphael as a lawyer should know better than to write: "As proof of the Vatican's ongoing and tolerant attitude toward Nazism, one need only cite the instance where Cardinal Lubachivski bestowed his Church's blessing on the Ukrainian Waffen SS Division at its 1993 reunion in Lviv." If a cardinal chooses to give a blessing how does that implicate the Vatican? What is gained by aggravating the existing tenuous relationship between Jews and Ukrainians in Canada in addition to jeopardizing the situation of the 750,000 Jews who have chosen to continue living in Ukraine.

Perspectives

Getting to the declaration...

By ELLI WOHLGELERNTER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

When Golda Meyerson – later Meir – waited to step up to the podium to add her name to Israel's Declaration of Independence, her thoughts went back to the legends she learned as a child in Milwaukee:

"From my childhood in America, I learned about the Declaration of Independence and the geniuses who signed it. I couldn't imagine these were real people doing something real. And here I am signing it, actually signing a Declaration of Independence. I didn't think it was due me, that I, Goldie Mabovich Meyerson, deserved it, that I had lived to see the day. My hands shook. We had done it. We had brought the Jewish people into existence.

"Whatever price any of us would have to pay for it, we had recreated the Jewish national home. The long exile was over. Now we were a nation like other nations, masters – for the first time in 20 centuries – of our own destiny," she continued.

"All I can recall about my actual signing of the proclamation is that I was crying openly, not able even to wipe the tears from my face... David Pincus asked me why I was crying and I said, 'One, because of the honor, and two, because there are people missing here... who had more of a right to be here and sign'... I wept almost beyond control." Others may not have wept, yet they felt their date with destiny.

Moshe Shertok (later Sharett), soon to be the first foreign minister, later recalled that he signed with "a sense of excitement together with a clear premonition of danger such as a man might feel while standing on a cliff, ready to leap into a yawning chasm. We felt as though we stood on a very high crest, where roaring winds were brewing about us, and that we had to stand fast."

It was, said Haim Shapira, a leader of Hapoel Hamizrachi, a forerunner of the National Religious Party, "a dream, a dream which we had never believed would come true in our lifetime. A miracle had happened."

Three historical dates led up to the "miracle:" Aug. 30, 1897, when the First Zionist Congress at Basel, Switzerland, adopted the Basel Program resolutions proclaiming Zionism's aim "to establish a home for the Jewish people in Eretz Yisrael to be guaranteed by international law;" Nov. 2, 1917, when the Balfour Declaration gave voice to British support for a Jewish homeland in Palestine; and Nov. 29, 1947, 30 years after Balfour and 50 years after Basel, when the United Nations voted to partition Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state.

Britain's decision to leave on May 15, 1948, gave the founding fathers their impetus to proclaim independence.

David Ben-Gurion sensed that it was now or never, and pushed to have statehood declared as the British were about to leave.

On May 12, the National Administration (Minhelet Ha'am), the quasi-cabinet known also as "The 13," met in Tel Aviv to discuss a draft of the declaration, which had been crafted mostly by Sharett, with help from other appointed members of the drafting committee: David Remez, Felix Rosenbleuth, Aharon Zisling and Shapira.

It is not surprising that with such disparate backgrounds among The 13, there was much wrangling over many specifics. The first argument was over what exactly should be declared.

Shertok, following discussions in the United States with high-ranking officials of the Truman administration, proposed the formation of a government, rather than a state. Rosenbleuth proposed the declaration of a state, within the framework of the UN partition resolution. Ben-Gurion decided on declaring a state "on the basis" of the UN vote.

Rosenbleuth and Behor Shitrit wanted the borders to be defined, but Zisling and Ben-Gurion were opposed. Ben-Gurion pointed out that the United States had not defined any borders when it declared independence, and besides, who knew where the borders would be at the end of the then-upcoming war?

"We accepted the UN resolution, but the Arabs did not," Ben-Gurion said. "They are preparing to make war on us. If we defeat them and capture western Galilee or territory on both sides of the road to Jerusalem, these areas will become part of the state. Why should we obligate ourselves to accept boundaries that in any case the Arabs don't accept?"

Then an even bigger question came up: What was the state to be called? Proposals included Zion, the Jewish State, Judea, the Land of Israel, Yehuda, and Ever, from the Hebrew Ivri. Ben-Gurion put forth Israel, and the name passed 6-3.

It was also agreed that independence would be declared at 4 p.m. on Friday – so as not to conflict with Shabbat – at the Tel Aviv Museum.

Shertok worked with the committee on revisions the next day, presenting a final version when the National Administration met that evening at 6 p.m. Criticized as too long, and with details still being debated, the document was given to Rabbi Yehuda Fishman of Hamizrachi, Zisling, Shertok and Ben-Gurion to finalize.

The next morning, Ben-Gurion submitted his text to the subcommittee, which approved it.

Shertok, meanwhile, had decided the night before that there should be an English translation of the text for distribution worldwide. Beginning at 10 p.m., after the National Administration meeting had ended, and working till 4 a.m., Shertok and his aides, using the Bible, the American Declaration of Independence, and Winston Churchill's speeches as models, drafted the English text.

At 1:50 p.m. the next day, 25 members of the National Council (Moetzet Ha'am) – 11 members were stuck in besieged Jerusalem and one was overseas – met at the Keren Kayemet building to approve the declaration. It was not a simple meeting. And there were only two hours until the signing ceremony was to begin.

Perhaps the biggest argument that final afternoon was over including "God" in the declaration. David Pinkas, a representative of Mizrachi, wanted the document to begin, "The Land of Israel was promised to the Jewish people in the Torah and by the prophets;" others wanted no mention – or even a hint – of a deity.

A compromise was reached to use the phrase "Tzur Yisrael," now translated as "Rock of Israel." Shertok had translated it as "Almighty God," and those words were used until an official version in 1962 changed it to "Rock of Israel." But objections were raised even to the "Tzur Yisrael" idea.

Ben-Gurion stepped in: "Each of us, in his own way, believes in the 'Rock of Israel' as he conceives it. I should like to make one request: Don't let me put this phrase to a vote."

He then asked the council to vote in two ballots on the document and added that council members stuck in besieged Jerusalem had approved it that morning.

"Now I ask all those in favor of the present text as a whole to raise their hands," Ben-Gurion said.

Everyone did.

The council also voted to repeal the White Paper of 1939 and Mandatory ordinances of 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1945, which limited immigration, land transfer and the Haganah. All other laws were to remain in effect pending future legislation.

The meeting adjourned at 3 p.m., leaving council members about an hour to change clothes, freshen up and get to 16 Rothschild Blvd.

The declaration of statehood was not a publicly declared event, as there were fears that the British – who still held nominal authority until midnight – might try and stop it and that Arab armies would move up plans to attack.

The one-page invitation to the ceremony sent out by messenger that morning included a paragraph saying: "We urge you to keep secret the contents of this invitation and time of the council meeting."

Despite the secrecy, hundreds of people began gathering outside the hall as soon as military guards started to cordon off the street in the early afternoon. Thousands more tuned in to the Voice of Israel to hear the station's first direct broadcast.

Inside, the guests – estimated at 250, including representatives of the Jewish Agency, the World Zionist Organization, leaders of political parties, cultural personalities, the chief rabbis, the Haganah chief of staff Yigael Yadin, and others – were all tightly packed in the small hall. Newspaper editors and correspondents made up the largest group.

Ze'ev Sharef, secretary of the National Administration, had stayed at the Keren Kayemet building, waiting for the final draft to be typed. While speeding to get to the Tel Aviv Museum on time, his driver was stopped by a policeman, who tried to give them a ticket. The officer withdrew after it was explained to him that there was no authority behind the ticket, and that he was delaying the proclamation of statehood.

At exactly 4 p.m., Ben-Gurion banged his walnut wood gavel to open the session. The crowd rose spontaneously to sing Hatikva. "I shall now read to you the scroll of the Establishment of the State, which has passed its first reading by the National Council," Ben-Gurion announced.

He proceeded to read the first 10 paragraphs, in essence the preamble, which explained the background for declaring independence: the history of the Jewish people, its struggle to renew a national life in its own land, and international recognition of its right to do so.

Ben-Gurion's voice then rose as he read the decisive 11th paragraph: "Accordingly, we the members of the National Council, representing the Jewish People in Palestine and the World Zionist Movement, are met together in solemn assembly today, the day of termination of the British Mandate for Palestine; and by virtue of the natural and historic right of the Jewish People and the Resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations, we hereby proclaim the establishment of the Jewish State in Palestine, to be called Medinat Yisrael [the State of Israel]."

It had taken him 16 minutes to read the 979 words of the declaration.

When the signatories to the declaration had all finished signing their names, Ben-Gurion declared, "The State of Israel is established. This meeting is adjourned."

After 1,878 years in exile, it had taken 32 minutes for the Jewish nation to be declared reborn.

At 5:25 a.m. the next day, May 15, 1948, the first Egyptian bombs fell on Tel Aviv. Syria, Jordan, Lebanon and Iraq joined in the attack. The War of Independence had begun.

Yom Huledet Samayach

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Israel celebrates its 50th year as a state. Reflections on that 50 years abound, from the local freebie tabloid on my front doorstep to the august New York Times, which celebrated the event by looking back at what was said about the state by some of its illustrious founders, from Jabotinsky to Golda, from Herzl to Weizmann.

Even Hollywood, that other Kingdom of the Jews, got into the act (no pun intended) by staging an unintentionally hilarious tribute to Israel. If you missed it, you missed a chance to see some real schlock, as well as a most moving tribute to the state by Kirk Douglas, a.k.a. Mickey Marcus.

Let's look at what was and is being said about Israel, the state. Two thousand years of pouring out our wish to return to Zion produced some great quotes – even though we ourselves are reading them from the comfort of our living rooms in the Diaspora, in the most livable country in the world, with the best health plan, slowest mail service (another oxymoron) and one of the most fractious parliaments.

Moses Hess returned to his Jewish roots after years of wandering in the realms of 19th-century philosophy and political thought. "After 20 years of estrangement," he wrote in Rome and Jerusalem, "I have returned to my people." He attempted to combine Zionism with a universalistic appreciation of the rights of all humankind, arguing that "the national character of Judaism does not exclude universalism and modern civilization; on the contrary, these values are the logical effects of our national character."

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, too, had a breadth of vision that sought to embrace modern Zionism at its most secular, while at the same time regarding the Zionist enterprise as the forerunner of the messianic age. Alas, his disciples have discarded his deep respect for all forms of the love of Zion and retained only a passionate belief in their ability to make the state a messianic instrument.

Rav Kook wrote: "To regard Eretz Yisrael as merely a tool for establishing our national unity – or even for sustaining our religion in the Diaspora by preserving its proper character and its faith, piety and observances – is a sterile notion; it is unworthy of the holiness of Eretz Yisrael." To Rav Kook, thoughts and actions outside Israel were of necessity less than perfect.

Only in Israel would we be able to find a pure vision and revelation. Yet he never sought to use that firm, mystical belief in the ability of the land to make us a holy people as a stick to beat his opponents with.

"How," he asked, "should men of faith respond to an age of ideological ferment which affirms all these values in the name of nationalism and denies their source, the rootedness of the national spirit, in God? ... work harder at the task of uncovering the light and holiness implicit in our national spirit, the divine element which is at its core. The secularists will thus be constrained to realize that they are immersed... in the life of God and bathed in the radiant light of sanctity that comes from above."

Rav Kook, that mystical realist, respected both secular and religious, because he truly believed that every human carried a divine spark that could be brought together in the new Jewish state. We could do well to take Rav Kook's position that every Jewish soul has a unique contribution to make to the cause of a Jewish nation.

And what vision can we all agree upon?

Yitzhak Rabin: "As a man who has led his country's struggle both on the battlefield and in political negotiations, who has been privileged to amass a unique combination of experience as a soldier, a diplomat and a head of government, there is no doubt whatsoever in my mind that the risks of peace are preferable by far to the grim certainties that await every nation in war."

Chaim Herzog: "Today's religious leadership must follow the lead given by my father and Rabbi Kook if that rift [between religious and secular] is to close. If we cannot bring about peace within our borders, how can we expect to achieve it outside them?"

And my favorite holy secularist, Golda: "My vision of our future? A Jewish state in which masses of Jews from all over the world will continue to settle and build; an Israel bound in a collaborative effort with its neighbors on behalf of all the people of this region; an Israel that remains a flourishing democracy and a society resting firmly on justice and equality"

We could wish for nothing more for the next 50 years. Happy birthday, Israel.

Rackets and racquets

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The media tend to overwhelm us with negative news. Wherever you turn, there is another avalanche, a flood or other disaster. It has now become commonplace to blame them all on El Nino, which is deemed responsible for everything we cannot otherwise explain.

El Nino has not so far been blamed for human mischief. While violent crimes seem to be fewer this year than last year, white-collar crimes have multiplied. Increasingly, rackets is the catch-word for the underworld.

I now turn to the racketerial homonym, which is "racquets." My interest in this handheld object is old. Ever since my 16th birthday, when my older cousin whom I much admired (and who ended up in Auschwitz) presented me with a wooden racquet, the sport of tennis has intrigued me, challenged me, disappointed me and remained my passion.

Twenty-one years ago, when children trained by the Israel Tennis Centre first turned up in Toronto to show off their prowess as "racqueteers," they presented themselves as products of a brand new type of Israeli youth. I soon became a supporter of the project, and in the pages of The Canadian Jewish News, I became a regular advocate of a splendid endeavor now known as Canada Israel Children Centres.

I have often wondered why I am so greatly attracted to this particular Israeli project, when there are so many others that demand my attention: universities, religious issues, civil rights, Canada-Israel relationships, and so on. I have written before, and I do not hesitate to repeat it, that in some ways this particular enterprise is different from others that we support regularly. It is, in my view, the only mass effort to change Israeli culture patterns.

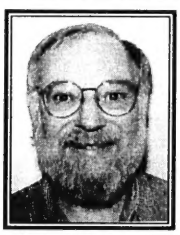
It has to do with toning down the self-assertive, raucous nature of Israeli interpersonal relationships. Tennis racquets are a symbol of self-critique, honesty, courtesy – and yet going all out to win, or at least to be our best.

For the last 21 years, we have entertained the children who have been involved in these programs, and have unreservedly admired not only their skill, but their behavior and their whole way of approaching us and each other. Every year, Toronto families have opened their homes to hosting several hundred guests who come to support the Children's Centres. By their hospitality, these couples have rendered all of us a great service, for they have provided the venue for raising large sums of money that, entirely fuelled by volunteer effort, have been transferred to Israel, there to be used to the fullest extent.

This year, at a gala tribute evening, these hosts of ours will be celebrated along with others who have made a singular contribution to this splendid effort. Alas, one of them, Gerry Pencer, is no longer with us, for after a long illness he recently passed away.

The evening will be all racquets, conviviality, goodwill and common purpose. Monty Hall will be the master of ceremonies and Leah Rabin will be the guest speaker. For more information, call Janice Segal at 905-660-1999.

In the big inning



By Shel Krakofsky in London

Question: Who is the only player in Major League history to strike out in 12 consecutive plate appearances? Hints: He was the youngest player ever elected into the Hall of Fame... his lifetime batting average was .097. The answer is at the end.

Now that the baseball season is blessedly back, it is time to dispel a longstanding and popular untruth that tennis is the first sport mentioned in the Torah. Aficionados of that sport like to point out that tennis appears first as "and Joseph served in Pharaoh's court." Cute. And wrong.

Fans of the to-and-fro game are herewith reminded that it is baseball that is the first game mentioned in the Torah. In fact, in the very first word of the very first sentence.

As Casey Stengel liked to say, "You can look it up!"

Casey, who managed the New York Yankees to seven World Series championships, was the inventor and master of "Stengelese," a term coined to describe the double talk he used to avoid answering questions.

If you are intimidated at shul or any other meetings, consider Stengel's 1958 appearance before a Congressional hearing looking into baseball's exemption from the antitrust laws. If you are confused by Stengel's performance, listen to Mickey Mantle's articulate summary of Stengel's jabberwocky. It's all in the United States Congressional Record, July 9, 1958... you can look it up.

Senator Langer: I want to know whether you intend to keep on monopolizing the world's championship in New York City?

Mr. Stengel: Well, I will tell you. I got a little concern yesterday in the first three innings when I saw the three players I had gotten rid of, and I said when I lost nine what am I going to do and when I had a couple of my players I thought so great of that did not do so good up to the sixth inning I was more confused but I finally had to go and call on a young man in Baltimore that we don't own and the Yankees don't own him, and he is doing pretty good, and I would actually have to tell you that I think we are more the Greta Garbo type now from success.

We are being hated, I mean, from the ownership and all, we are being hated. Every sport that gets too great or one individual – but if we made 27 cents and it pays to have a winner at home, why would you have a good winner in your own park if you were an owner?

That is the result of baseball. An owner gets most of the money at home and it is up to him and his staff to do better or they ought to be discharged.

Senator Kefauver: Thank you very much, Mr. Stengel. We appreciate your presence here. Mr. Mickey Mantle, will you come around... Mr. Mantle, do you have any observations with reference to the applicability of the antitrust laws to baseball?

Mr. Mantle: My views are just about the same as Casey's.

Answer to question: Sandy Koufax. Not only did Koufax strike out 12 times in a row, they were the first 12 at-bats of his career and his only at-bats as a 1955 Brooklyn Dodger. It was Koufax's arm, not his bat that brought him to Cooperstown in 1972.

He won the Cy Young award in 1963, 1965 and 1966, and captured the earned run title from 1962 to '66, a five year average of 1.99, the lowest for that long a stretch in baseball history. And it was Koufax who refused to pitch on Yom Kippur, the opening game of the 1965 World Series. That, you don't have to look up.

A few years ago, a friend of mine said, "Because Sandy Koufax didn't play on Yom Kippur, he was my hero. If he had refused to pitch on Shabbat, he could have been my teacher."

The Kirshner File

Joseph Heller, Catch-22 author, looks back

By Sheldon Kirshner

Hunched over his desk one morning at a small New York advertising agency, a 30-year-old Jewish war veteran, his mind brimming with ideas from a dream the night before, began writing the first chapter of an intended novel.

It was 1953.

As usual, Joseph Heller wrote slowly, polishing his prose as he went along.

Two years later, a literary quarterly, New World Writing, published the first chapter under the title of Catch-18.

In 1957, with the book almost half finished, Heller received an advance from Simon & Schuster, the publisher. By then he had switched jobs and was churning out ad copy for Time magazine.

In 1961, while working for McCall's in a similar position, he finally completed the manuscript. His editor, Robert Gotlieb, liked it. There was only one problem. The title, Catch-18, had to be modified. Mila 18, Leon Uris's novel about the Warsaw ghetto, had just been published, and readers might not want to buy two books with the number 18.

Gotlieb called Heller. "I think I have it," he said. "Don't say no until you hear it: Catch-22."

"My God," he said. "That's it."

Catch-22, published 37 years ago in October, has become a classic of dark satire, the quintessential anti-war novel which transcends generations. But, as Heller recalled in a recent phone conversation to publicize the publication of his memoirs, Now and Then, Catch-22 was not an immediate success. The reviews were decidedly mixed, with one prominent reviewer savaging it as devoid of craft.

It seemed as if the novel, based on Heller's experiences as a bombardier in the American air force during World War II, might be lost in the shuffle.

Not to put too fine a point on it, Catch-22 dumbfounded the critics, and changed Heller's life.

The book – whose film rights were purchased by Mike Nichols – shot to the top of the charts as a paperback and was translated into numerous foreign languages, including Hebrew. At last count, it had sold 22 million copies around the world.

As for Heller, Catch-22 gave him the confidence to leave the field of copywriting, which he had regarded as little more than a stopgap, and the uninterrupted freedom to write novels.

"It enabled me to be an independent writer," he said from his home in Long Island, New York. "It let me live the life I wanted to."

Since that blessed day, Heller, who turns 75 this month, has produced one play, six novels and, most recently, his memoirs. As for the latter, he said: "It would have been pretentious to have written Now and Then sooner, and posthumous had I waited longer."

Like Catch-22, Now and Then does not follow a simple chronological time-line, jumping back and forth from his boyhood in Coney Island to the present.

As one might expect, Catch-22, which I read as a teenager, casts a giant shadow over Now and Then.

In an interview, Heller said that the attitudes and sensibilities informing Catch-22 were largely shaped by the Cold War, the McCarthyist hearings and the civil rights struggle in the United States.

Yossarian, the central figure in the novel, is deliberately an Assyrian. "I wanted him outside the stream of North American ethnic groups. But he's unconsciously Jewish, like James Joyce's Leopold Bloom."

Alluding to other writers who influenced him in the writing of Catch-22, Heller mentioned William Faulkner, Vladimir Nabakov, Louis Ferdinand Celine and Evelyn Waugh.

The son of Russian immigrants, he was raised in a neighborhood mainly populated by east European Jews. His father, a truck driver, died of a bleeding ulcer when Heller was only five. His mother, a seamstress whose forebears were bookbinders, read Yiddish books he would bring home from the public library.

As he recalls, his family was poor. "We were prudent with money because we didn't have much," he writes in Now and Then. As a boy, he lowered his expectations. "We did not want what we could not hope to have, and we were not made bitter or envious by knowing of people who had much more."

Heller was a good student, taking readily to reading, writing and arithmetic. But before the war, he did not think seriously of attending college. Returning from Europe after 1945, he studied English literature at New York University and the University of Southern California.

Heller had evinced an interest in journalism, but the required courses in copy editing, rewriting, proof reading and layout turned him off.

He wrote his first short stories in elementary school. In 1939, when he was 16, he submitted a short story about the Russian-Finnish war to the New York Daily News and two national magazines, Collier's and Liberty. It was rejected by all three. Not until 1948 did he finally break into print.

Like an old-fashioned craftsman, Heller composes in longhand. But in a concession to modernity, he uses a computer for rewrites. Normally, he writes about 300 words in a regular working day. "After that" he said, "I'm out of words."

Heller does not plan his plots in advance. "I start out with a character and a few lines," he explained.

When interviewers ask him why he writes, he tends to be facetious. "I have little else to do with my time except write books," he told Pamela Wallin the other night on her nightly CBC television program.

Is he serious? Perhaps. Heller has no hobbies and avoids common recreational activities such as golf. But he enjoys reading and music (jazz and classical) and is fond of scotch; dry, very cold martinis; and fine food.

More than 10 years ago, he was stricken by a disease of the peripheral nervous system which paralyzed him and made swallowing impossible. He recovered, but the lingering effects – weakness of facial and shoulder muscles – remain with him. Shortly after leaving the hospital, he married his nurse, his second wife.

Does he have any advice for would-be writers?

Turn to page 211 of Now and Then, wherein Heller observes: "In talking to groups of aspiring authors, I have frequently emphasized, particularly when the audience was made up of young people, that unless they had money, would inherit money, or would marry money, they were going to have to work at something else for quite a while, even if everything they wrote from that moment on found publication."

A catalogue and a disc

Joel Cahen, deputy director and chief curator of Beth Hatefutsoth, The Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora in Tel Aviv, is in the habit of sending me catalogues that coincide with exhibitions. The latest catalogue in a superb series is entitled The Gaon of Vilna: The Man and his Legacy. Printed in English and Hebrew, it marks the bicentennial of the Gaon's death, and is certainly well worth keeping in one's library.

As well, Cahen informs me that the museum has just released a set of discs celebrating Reform cantorial music and a software package for Jewish genealogy.

Originally recorded in Berlin between 1928 and 1930, the discs preserve two hours of synagogue music as performed by soloists who would all become famous. They include Joseph Schmidt and Frederick Lechner.

The software, known as Ilanot, enables you to keep track of your family tree and displays four or five generations at a time.

In praise of 50

To the Land of Israel:

The Mishnah says: "Fifty years is for the ability to give counsel." Let anyone who wishes to peek at creation take note of how your desert blooms. Let anyone who scoffs at dreamers give attention to your flag.

The Talmud says there are "50 gates of understanding." The Zohar says that when Abraham bargained with G-d for the lives of the people in Sodom, he began with the number 50. Fifty is the entrance to understanding. All those who think it was easy should understand each of your years. With each anniversary, you understood the feeling of soldiers marching upon your soil. As time passed, the tears of the parent and the blood of the young turned your sand to mud. We are told that all the gates of understanding were given to Moses – all but one, for who can truly understand?

The Zohar says there are windows in the sky. Each window is divided into 50 sections. Each section provides a different perspective on the stars, the planets, the heavens. The road to peace is difficult and the perspectives are many. The Jewish people are one nation and the perspectives are many. Let us assure you we are all looking through the same window, but the glass has 50 prisms.

The Torah says G-d brought Israel out of Egypt. The Torah says this 50 times. Fifty is for redemption.

The Jewish people say the Shema twice each day. The proclamation of the Shema is 25 letters long. Every day our Shema contains 50 letters. Fifty is for covenant. Fifty is for promises. Fifty is for challenges.

The Zohar says the brain has 50 gateways. Fifty is for wisdom. Fifty is for learning. Fifty is for teaching.

When the Jewish nation first entered the land of Israel, Joshua sent two spies. These spies were sheltered and aided by Rachab, the harlot of Jericho. The Talmud says Rachab was 50 years old when she converted and married Joshua. Fifty is for new beginnings.

The Torah states: "Hallow the 50th year. Proclaim liberty throughout the land!" Fifty is for jubilation.

Gun control: A Jewish look

On March 24, in Jonesboro, Ark., two junior high school students armed with rifles murdered four of their schoolmates and one of their teachers. These horrible murders reignited the ongoing international debate about gun control.

Comparative Law

In Canada, the Canadian Parliament has passed several major pieces of legislation requiring gun control. In 1995, it passed Bill C-68 requiring all guns and rifles to be included in a national gun registry. This followed previous laws prohibiting machine-guns, and requiring the training and screening of all owners of firearms. To opponents of gun control laws, these laws are a nuisance for law abiding gun owners and have little effect on violent crime.

Proponents of these laws point to extensive academic research indicating that these laws save lives and increase safety. What does Jewish law (Halachah) have to say about this issue?

In Judaism, safety is a religious concern. The Bible requires that a roof be properly gated, in order to prevent people from falling off of it (Deuteronomy 22:8). This commandment is understood by the Talmud as a general directive to remove any safety hazard (Bava Kamma 15b; Shulchan Aruch CM 427:8). Contemporary rabbinic authorities include in this commandment an employer's responsibility to ensure occupational safety (Piskei Uziel 47) and an injunction against reckless driving (Minchat Yitzchak 8:148).

Someone who refuses to remove a safety hazard can be punished by excommunication (YD 334:7). In general, safety regulations are treated with far greater stringency than any other section of Halachah (YD 116:7). Clearly, any Jewish view of gun control would place high value on safety.

In the Talmud there are specific regulations that resemble gun control. There is a law against owning a dangerous dog (Bava Kamma 79a). One who owns a dangerous dog must keep it tied in metal chains at all times (CM 409:3). Even if the dog is defanged or trained not to harm people, it must be chained, because it may frighten strangers and as a result cause stress-related injuries such as miscarriage and heart attacks (Shabbat 63b).

One of the more pious rabbis, Rabbi Pinchas Ben Yair, was so stringent about this law that he refused to own mules, because they can occasionally cause injury (Hullin 7b; Terumat Hadeshen 2:105). However, there were instances where allowances were made. In border communities, where there is a threat of marauders, owners of dangerous dogs may unchain them at night for protection. Some say that any dangerous city is similar to a border community (CM 409:3).

These sources demonstrate that Halachah would require any gun to be carefully locked at all times, with allowances made in cases where the gun is actively being used for security. Those who are more stringent would avoid guns completely. (It should also be noted that many authorities prohibit hunting for sport; Rama OH 316:2, Darchei Teshuva YD 117:44.)

Another law is of relevance. The Talmud prohibits someone from selling offensive weapons to idol worshippers and suspected criminals (Avodah Zarah 15b; YD 151:5-6). The rule against selling to idol worshippers is based on an assumption that the idol worshippers will use them against Jews; however, if the Jews are allied with the idol worshippers, it is permitted to sell them arms.

It is likewise prohibited to sell such weapons to anyone suspected of reselling them to criminals. This Halachah requires that the buyers of firearms be carefully screened, and resembles in many ways laws requiring a national registry of gun and rifle owners.

Although Halachah is extremely concerned about safety, it does not prohibit the ownership of guns. However, recognizing that a gun is a dangerous object, Halachah (like many current gun control laws) requires that owners and vendors of guns take all possible precautions to prevent their guns from causing any harm.

Love and reproof must be balanced

By RABBI MOSHE YERES

Many of us are familiar with the talmudic tale of Hillel and the gentile who wanted to learn all the Torah while standing on one foot. Hillel's adage was: "What is hateful to you, do not do to others – all the rest is commentary, now go and study it."

This is similar to Rabbi Akiva's statement referring to the verse, "Love thy neighbor as thyself." Rabbi Akiva says, "This is a great rule (klal gadol) in the Torah." Both men underscore the importance of interpersonal relations in a Jewish Torah society.

Now where is the verse found? It is in this week's reading of Leviticus 19:18 – in the middle parshah of the middle book Vayikra – in the centre of the Torah!

Yet we often forget the conclusion of Hillel's statement: "The rest is commentary, go and study." So let us try to understand what the Torah says.

A couple of questions immediately come to mind upon reading this verse. Can G-d actually command and require me to love my neighbor? What does this commandment then require?

Part of the mitzvah of "love thy neighbor as thyself" is to recognize that both of you form part of a larger whole, klal Yisrael, a sum total larger in life than its components.

"Love thy neighbor as thyself" – forget not that you and he share the common destiny of the Jewish people.

Perhaps no one said it better than Mordecai, who told Esther: "If you remain silent at this time, relief and deliverance shall arise from elsewhere, but you and your father's house shall perish." (Esther 4:14)

"Love thy neighbor as thyself." One may not cut oneself off from the community. Listen to the example of Rabbi Simon bar Yochai in Midrash Rabbah. A group of men were sitting in a boat. One of them took a drill and began to drill underneath. His friends said to him: "What are you sitting and doing?" He said to them: "What does it matter to you? Am I not drilling under myself?" They said to him that the water would rise and flood over the boat. (Leviticus Rabbah 4:6)

Don't we all sit together in the same boat of shared Jewish community?

The Kotzker Rebbe is purported to have noted in commenting on Exodus 2:11: What gave Moses greatness and grandeur (vayigdal Moshe)? It was joining his brethren (va'yetze el echav).

Yet to love does not necessarily mean to condone and blindly accept all that is clearly not correct. The verse immediately prior to the above states: "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart; thou shalt surely rebuke thy neighbor and not bear sin because of him." (Leviticus 19:17)

Contradictory you say! Hear the wise words of the midrash. Rabbi Yosi ben Rav Chanina said that reproof leads to love, as it says: "reprove a wise man and he will love you" (Proverbs 9:8) and "Love unaccompanied by reproof is not true love." (Genesis Rabbah 54:3)

Both love and reproof can be combined; the challenge is to balance both with sensitivity.

Israel's role in our lives

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Israel's 50th birthday has come and gone. But the country's jubilee celebrations continue. Over the coming months, in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary, I will cover such topics such as aliyah, the rebirth of Hebrew and how the world press and the World Wide Web are covering the birthday. Today, more Internet birthday sites. Some of these sites will amuse you. Others may anger you. But I hope that they will all provoke you to think about the role Israel plays in our lives.

Virtual Jerusalem's Israel@50 [http://www.israelat50.com/] divides itself into three logical sections. "Past" has articles on the country's leaders, a photo tour of the birth of the country and 50@50: a profile of 50 immigrants, each of whom arrived during a different year of the state's existence. "Present" lists 50 amazing Israeli achievements (military, medical and more), an Israel quiz and an article called Israel is the Only Country in the World Where… Some examples: "…where framed copies of the Ten Commandments are posted on the walls of railroad passenger cars; …where there is an annual Bible quiz for prison inmates; …and where the president and his wife hold an open house for 5,000 in their sukkah." The "Future" site examines Israel's high-tech future, lets you buy a tree through the JNF online, and takes a look at the state of the State during its second 50 years.

The Jewish Communications Network [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Index.asp?columnId=65] offers a series of thought-provoking articles such as Who is a Zionist? According to a public opinion poll, Israelis considered Druze soldiers more staunch Zionists than U.S. Jews or new Russian immigrants to Israel. In the essay A Time to Reassess, Rabbi Jerome M. Epstein of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism draws a parallel between this 50th birthday and the biblical jubilee, the Yovel. According to Rabbi Epstein, now is the time for "a national reassessment of our priorities as a people."

And over at Jewishfamily.com [http://www.shamash.org/jfl/holidays/israel.htm], you'll find links to several intriguing articles including Talking to Your Kids about Israel and Talking to Your Kids about Arabs.

Do you have thoughts about Israel's birthday bubbling inside you that you need to express? Then enter one of JCN's discussion forums. [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/newforum.asp]. Topics includes Aliyah: Should we go or should we stay?; A Democratic Jewish State; and What do you think of Israel and the Israelis?

Of course, there's much more out there about Israel at 50. Try the JCN link page [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=1568], Maven's Links [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx129.htm], and the Mining Co. Guide to Israeli Culture [http://israeliculture.miningco.com/library/weekly/aa033098.htm].

That should keep you busy for now. Next week, more on Israel at 50 – in Hebrew!

I want to thank Judy Cohen for the following note: "I am a 69-year-old witness to the Shoah and while researching the Net, I noticed the void on the Net re: women's special predicament during the Shoah. So I created one." Women and the Holocaust [http://www.interlog.com/~mighty] is a very personal and powerful work. I recommend taking a look at it.

Prior to the official program, thousands of people milled about in an open area outside the auditorium that had been turned into an Israeli streetscape and Heritage Court, designed by Renée Rubinstein. Others joined massive lineups for food, while bartenders serving alcoholic beverages stood waiting for customers.

Remarking on the jubilee celebrations, Syd Gladstone said, "I was around for the birth and it's fantastic that I and Israel are around today. I hope it's here for my children and grandchildren."

Shira Levy, one of 200 volunteers at the evening's festivities, found the celebration heartwarming. "It's amazing, the people who are here. It spans generations."

The night of a lifetime

Sheila Rother said, "I felt like I had to be here to show my support for Israel."

"We've been to Israel twice and loved it," her husband Danny said. "Being there... I get goosebumps when I hear Hatikvah."

Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman stated simply: "May there be many more 50 [year] anniversaries in peace. Enough Jewish blood."

The Night of a Lifetime program was produced by Robert Benia. Composer Stephen Glass created the background music for the evening's entertainment. Artists who performed included the Israel at 50 Orchestra, conducted by Boris Brott; The Israel at 50 Children's Ensemble (singers from Bialik, United Synagogue Day School and Associated); Sharabi; Waxman; cellist Ofra Harnoy; Kowarsky, Maissner and Motzen; and the Me'irim Dance Company (Catriona Ferguson, Tanya Findlay, Dora Ladas, Alexei Odintsov, Sergei Osadchuk, Patrick Parson and Ronald Taylor.)

A CELEBRATION TO REMEMBER

It was a memorable occasion. More than 10,000 people gathered at the National Trade Centre, Exhibition Place in Toronto, to sing, dance, be entertained and say "Happy 50th anniversary, Israel." These scenes attempt to convey the sense of unreserved celebration and joy that pervaded the evening, an evening that not only united the multigenerational gathering but also, for the moment at least, the three levels of political leaders as well.

Sephardi contributions to Israel recognized

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sephardi Jews in the land of Israel were involved in important community and commercial endeavors long before their Ashkenazi counterparts began to make aliyah in significant numbers.

That was the message of Joseph Glass of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Geography department, when he spoke recently at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill on Sephardic Contributions to the Upbuilding of Eretz Israel.

Over 150 people attended the lecture, which marked Israel's 50th anniversary and was co-sponsored by the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Sephardic Kehila Centre.

Glass, an alumnus of Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto who received his doctorate from the Hebrew University in 1996, is co-author of the book Sephardi Entrepreneurs in Eretz Israel, the Amzalak Family, 1816-1918.

According to family lore, Joseph Amzalak, a native of the British crown colony Gibraltar, was a slave trader in the early 1800s. He apparently changed course following the outbreak of a deadly plague in 1813 in Malta, where he was living at the time. "He met up with a rabbi who warned him if he didn't give up his evil ways – the trade in human lives – he too would perish in the plague," said Glass.

Amzalak moved to what was then Palestine, where he became involved in trade. Glass' presentation included a slide of an 1816 letter from the Jews of Tzfat thanking Amzalak for purchasing holy books.

In 1920, Amzalak moved from Acre to Jerusalem, where he worked to assist the small, impoverished Jewish community. He also lent money to the Ottoman government and to Christian churches.

The Amzalak house, which was considered one of the most beautiful in Jerusalem, still stands just inside the Jaffa Gate, said Glass.

In addition to his business ventures and philanthropy, Amzalak served as a mohel and was known for his hospitality. Sir Moses and Lady Judith Montefiore usually stayed with the Amzalaks on their visits to Israel, Glass said.

"Amzalak represents the transfer of a vast amount of capital to the land of Israel, and he's not the only one," said Glass. In the 1830s and '40s, a number of Jews from North Africa followed his example, Glass added.

"Many of the Sephardi families started to move to the new developing port cities – Jaffa and Haifa," said Glass.

Amzalak's second son, Hayyim, settled in Jaffa and exported grain and oranges to Europe. Later he would purchase land for Russian Jewish immigrants when they were not allowed to do so on their own. The Amzalaks, along with other Sephardim, were among the prominent members of a committee to help new immigrants obtain food and shelter.

Sephardi immigrants and their children had the advantage of being multilingual and, as foreign citizens, they were exempt from import duties paid by Ottoman traders.

An Amzalak grandson, Joseph Navon, played an important role in bringing rail travel to Israel in the late 1800s. In 1888, he received a concession to construct a railway from Jaffa to Jerusalem.

This transformed the country's transportation system, explained Glass. Until the 1860s, it took two days, on foot or by donkey, to reach Jaffa from Jerusalem. A new, paved road brought the time down to 12 hours in the 1860s, but the railway, with its trip of about three hours, meant "a revolution in travel and in the transportation of goods."

Sephardim constituted the "vast majority" of Palestine's Jewish community in 1800, but by 1914 they made up only one third of the country's Jewish population.

Although there were many important Sephardi contributions during and after the British mandate, said Glass, the Sephardi families lost their prominent position as Eastern European immigrants gained prominence.

Holocaust survivors recalled at Christian service

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Jewish studies department should be included in every school of Christian theology, says a retired Lutheran minister.

"My theological education failed to tell me about the Holocaust and Judaism," Rev. Glenn Nelson, recently retired pastor of St. Ansgar Lutheran Church, Toronto, said at the 18th annual Christian Service in Memory of the Holocaust held at St. Peter's Anglican Church, Erindale.

As part of the service, Mayor Hazel McCallion of Mississauga read the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Yom Hashoah

Earlier in the day, flames had destroyed the renovated Trinity Anglican Church in nearby Streetsville. McCallion is a parishoner at the historic church. A 17-year-old youth has been charged with arson.

Rev. Nelson recalled that there were no Jews where he was brought up, except the "off-limits" classmate of his sister. "My knowledge of Jews was limited to barbaric colloquialisms such as 'Jewing down the price' and 'the sheeny is coming.'"

He thanked the Holocaust survivors attending the service for expressing their sorrow in public. "We have come a long way past the indifference to the annihilation of Jews. I want to offer regret for the way the Christian Church has scapegoated the Jews."

Taking as title of his sermon, From Millstone to Milestone, Rev. Nelson said many Christians were unable until recently to understand the Holocaust – that it was a barrier to communication. "It was a millstone holding us back," he said.

"We do not hold this service just for Jews, but for ourselves. Their memory is ours. The Holocaust is as much an event of Christian history as of Jewish history."

The milestone aspect of his sermon referred to Israel which, he said, "was a hopeless fantasy 50 years ago."

Candles were lit by survivor George Salamon; resistance fighter Jack Heidema; Ena Bettings, a child of Righteous Gentiles, representing her father Jan Kappen; Rev. Douglas McKenzie, Toronto Christian-Jewish Dialogue board; Anna Booth and Dana Newman, Jewish and Christian friends; Donald Laitin, Holocaust Remembrance Committee; and Anne Edilitz, a hidden child.

The candelabrum was made by David Hart of Holy Blossom Temple a long-time participant in Christian-Jewish dialogue.

Also taking part were Rev. Stephen Booth, St. Peter's Church minister; Catherine Durland; Roy Ackroyd; Cantor Michael Steinhouse; Lillian Newberry Timson; Rev. Ian MacPherson; the church choir directed by Peter Hanson; Rev. Canon A.H. Gordon Baker; Rev. Brian Prideaux; Rabbi Lawence Englander; and Rev. Dr. A.H. Harry Oussoren.

The service was held under auspices of Christian-Jewish Dialgue of Toronto. A reception was held in the parish hall with kosher food available.

BABY JAMIE HAS JUST KICKED THE DELIVERY NURSE AND BUCKED THE ODDS.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

Jamie's mom has a condition called gestational diabetes. Most doctors call it a recipe for a high-risk birth. It's what happens when the expectant mother can't process sugar properly. Her fetus can receive too much glucose and grow too large, which complicates matters during labour and delivery.

At Mount Sinai, there are dozens of people pulling for high-risk babies like little Jamie. And pushing the boundaries of medicine to help stack the odds in his favour.

In this case, a team including obstetricians, the hospital's perinatal specialist and a certified diabetes educator worked hand in glove with the mother. They taught her how to manage her diet and monitor her glucose.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL
THE BEST MEDICINE

For its part, the ultrasonic screening unit made sure the fetus wasn't growing too large. In the event that he did, the team was ready to induce labour.

This case represents just one example of the seamless care that Mount Sinai is dedicated to delivering. At the same time, it demonstrates the benefits of having experts from various disciplines work together.

We're happy to report that Jamie entered the world with no complications. Another happy ending. And one of the many reasons why we are launching a campaign called The Best Medicine.

Sher undaunted by verbal attacks, says Farber

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The verbal attacks on Neal Sher by two members of the Reform party at a Commons justice committee will not deter him in his hunt for war criminals, according to Bernie Farber, who was in Ottawa at the meeting where Sher was attacked.

The criticism of Sher, a consultant to the Canadian war crimes unit, is part of an organized campaign by people "from eastern European countries," which resulted in hundreds of "gratuitous and insufferable" letters and phone calls to members of Parliament, Farber said.

Director of the Ontario region, Canadian Jewish Congress, Farber was the speaker at a Frances Bitterman memorial lecture at Beth Tikvah synagogue.

"It was painful for me to see and hear a hero of the Jewish people treated this way. He [Sher] was particularly disturbed by one MP calling for his resignation. But he is an optimist and said this kind of attack comes with the territory. He has faced it in the United States. My own belief is that he will chew these critics up for breakfast."

Neal Sher

Sher has done more to bring Nazi criminals to justice than anyone else, Farber said. As a result of Sher's work, 100 U.S. citizens have been denaturalized and 60 others deported.

He said Reform MP Jack Ramsay was more interested in proving John Demjanjuk to be innocent than in hearing Sher's explanation that "mistakes were made" in Demjanjuk's prosecution.

Demjanjuk was released by the Israeli Supreme Court, who said it had "niggling doubts" about the case, Farber said, but the court still described him in its verdict as a "vachman" or death camp guard though he may not have been Ivan the Terrible.

There will always be anti-Semitism, "because we do not have a perfect society," Farber said, but most Canadians are decent and are just as angry about the desecration of gravestones at a St. Catharines Jewish cemetery as Jews are.

New action group to aid people with special needs

TORONTO — The recent collaboration of Reena and Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) has led to the creation of the Jewish Community Action Group, which will support people with special needs and their families.

The group was made possible through a grant from the UJA Federation Endowment.

More than 50 parents, professionals and volunteer advocates met recently to determine the areas of interest to be focused on by the action group. Issues such as social inclusion, respite care, planning for the future, day-school integration, accessing information, and informal supports for families will be addressed in practical and proactive ways.

Participants formed working groups that will meet to decide how to focus their energy and attention.

"It is my hope that each group will take on a project that can change the face of our Jewish community," said Micki Bregman, chair of the action group. "Members of the community who are interested in helping us to make a difference in one of these areas are encouraged to become involved."

The working groups have already generated some ideas. Community awareness programs in the Jewish day schools will be offered; the possibility of mentoring programs for parents and families will likely be considered; and a comprehensive Jewish resource book for families of children with special needs will hopefully become a reality. Other gaps in service have been identified.

The group also hopes to break down intra-agency barriers to prove that collaboration is possible and necessary if one hopes to effect change. Along these lines, Reena and JF&CS will be partnering with Zareinu Educational Centre. Zareinu recently launched its Project Outreach, which focuses on the integration of children with special needs in Jewish day school settings.

Booklet helps those in need

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A natural response to serious trouble is to turn to prayer.

Many, however, beyond personal pleas to G-d, don't know how or what to do in any formal fashion.

For I Am The Lord Who Heals You, prepared by the Association of Jewish Chaplains of Ontario, and Chaplaincy Services, Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), is meant to help those people.

Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of JF&CS Chaplaincy Services, told The CJN that "based on our experience, there is a need for a publication to appeal to Jews across the spectrum of observance."

He said that it should be a source of "comfort and encouragement to those isolated or physically removed [from the community]".

The booklet is a compendium of psalms, poems, prayers (both parts of the regular daily ritual and special prayers for the sick or needy), and meditations, in both Hebrew and English.

It is not for everyone, the rabbi said, explaining that the more religious might want a book of Psalms or a siddur, either of which would be provided for them.

However, 90 percent "are not like that," he said.

For I Am The Lord Who Heals You is free to anyone who asks for it. It is also made available to every family affiliated with the JF & CS hospice program.

'Matchmaker' seeks homes for foreign students

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Housing foreign students enriches one's home, according to Patti Dolman. And she should know. In the last four years, Dolman has hosted some 30 foreign students who have come to Toronto to study English through the Language Workshop.

"I've really enjoyed taking in students," Dolman told The CJN in a recent interview. "There's a bond made when a child comes into your home. Friendships are formed. It's a rewarding cultural interchange."

The experience is also gratifying to her 8-year-old daughter Tali, a Grade 2 student at Netivot HaTorah Day School, Dolman said, because "the students become an extension of the family. They brighten up the house and they add a new dimension to the household."

Up until now, the students have not been Jewish, said the Thornhill mother, who keeps a scrapbook of letters and pictures of the students, but she added that for the first time, the Language Workshop will be offering a special program for Jewish students this summer. A group of 15 Jewish teenagers from Brazil will be arriving in the Thornhill area to study English for the month of July.

Dolman has been hired to coordinate the Thornhill program this year and now she's trying to match the Brazilian students with Jewish families, she said.

The students, who range in age from 13 to 19, prefer to stay with Jewish families, she said, explaining that the Language Workshop has given assurances to the Brazilian families that their children will be housed with Canadian Jewish families.

The host families selected write a letter of introduction to the families abroad, who in turn write their own letters of introduction, she said. "By comparing information like hobbies, interests, age of children, in the letters, I try to find the best matches.

"We encourage communication between the host family and the student once a match is made, before the students arrive. It makes the students' families feel more comfortable about sending their child."

The students from Brazil will be joining approximately 25 students from Spain, who will also need places to stay in the Thornhill area where the English languages classes are held.

While these Spanish students are not Jewish, like most of the students have stayed with Dolman – she is shomer Shabbat – they learn to respect the customs of host families, she said.

"All our students are completely versed in what happens here on Shabbat. We ask them to respect our home and tradition."

The Language Workshop, a privately run company based in Toronto, with offices in Spain and affiliate offices in Brazil, France, and Japan, has been running a program in Markham for nine years; students are screened by "reputable agents" before being accepted into the program, and all the students know some English before they arrive, Dolman said.

The students often go on outings organized by the language school, and in their spare time they enjoy shopping and going out with each other, so that host families don't have to entertain them, she said. The students are also monitored and given support by male and female group leaders from their respective countries.

The school pays host families a weekly stipend of $120 per child to cover the cost of food. Families interested in hosting a foreign student can contact Dolman at 905-881-6340.

CJN article helps man discover lost brothers' fate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sometime this June, in a forest outside the town of Dukla, Poland, Shimon Yarmusch will stand over the gravesite of his two slain brothers and recite Psalms in their memory.

Afterwards, he will trek to the cottage of local peasant Jan "Vanio" Holuta and present him with a plaque to thank him for patiently tending the gravesite for 55 years and for waiting for someone to return to the forest to honor the boys' memories.

Since World War II, the precise fate of his two brothers was unknown to Yarmusch, who is now semi-retired and living in Florida. The boys had escaped a mass shooting that claimed the lives of 500 Jews from Dukla, but they were later hunted down and murdered by a Nazi collaborator.

Jerzy Jastrzebowski

This June will mark the first time since the two youths were gunned down that Yarmusch will have had the opportunity to visit the place where they fell.

Yarmusch only learned of his brothers' fate thanks to an article by Jerzy Jastrzebowski that appeared in the Feb. 5 edition of The CJN. In the article, titled "A different remembrance," Jastrzebowski told the story of the Yarmusch brothers and made a plea to surviving Jews from Dukla to provide a minyan "so that two kids who did nothing wrong, except being born in the wrong place at the wrong time, get a decent funeral at last."

The article prompted "an explosion of interest" and numerous calls from CJN readers who were moved by the story, Jastrzebowski said.

News prompted 'explosion of interest'

News of the article spread far and wide and he received calls from Toronto, Montreal, New York, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Florida.

"The amount of interest in the article... defies imagination. There was a spontaneous reaction," he said.

Jastrzebowski was told of a group of young Jews, the children of survivors, who wept over the story's plea for a minyan to pray over the young boys' grave.

He received a call from a teacher in a small town in Maryland interested in the genealogy of Galician (from southern Poland) Jews, as well as a call from a Toronto reader who wanted to thank him for showing respect for and interest in the fate of two Jewish lads.

The story eventually was faxed from a Montreal reader to Yarmusch's two sons in New York. They of course passed it along to their father.

Jastrzebowski and Yarmusch, who is now around 75, eventually made contact and agreed to meet in Warsaw this summer. Although the arrangements are incomplete, it appears Yarmusch will be accompanied by his wife Renee, perhaps his two daughters and perhaps by a New York rabbi who is a friend of Yarmusch and who hails from Katowice.

From Warsaw, they will drive 500 kilometres to the home of a peasant family, where they will spend the night. The next day, they will travel to Dukla to see the Yarmusch's old home and then go to the gravesite.

Jastrzebowski, a senior editor with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, said he's always felt an affinity for Polish Jews and their stories. He traces it back to a conversation he had with his grandmother when he was a small boy.

"Nana, who are Jews?" he asked her.

"Well, Jews are normal people just like you or I. Perhaps a little brighter," was her response. "I never forgot that conversation."

In 1966, while hiking across Poland's Carpathian Mountains, he chanced upon a peasant family that put him up for the night. They became friends and through them he learned of the fate of the Jews of Dukla.

"It's incredible," Jastrzebowski said. "There are killing fields all over there. Most are marked, some are unmarked."

But for an iron peg to mark the site and Holuta's memory of what transpired, the grave of the Yarmusch brothers would have been forgotten, Jastrzebowski said.

When he learned of the story of the Dukla Jews and about "an uneducated Polish/Ukrainian peasant who has been tending the graves," he became determined to tell the story. A Polish version of the article ran in the newspaper Rzeczpospolita (The Republic), but it solicited virtually no response.

Nevertheless, Jastrzebowski said he was determined to "do my duty and my duty is to keep my commitment that these two nameless Jewish boys will be remembered. I will bring the surviving brother to the grave so he can pay homage."

He hopes local Polish Jews will participate in a minyan and that Kaddish will be said over the remains. Eventually, Yarmusch hopes to exhume the bodies and rebury them in Israel, Jastrzebowski said.

Rosenberg Fund awards grants

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two teenage children of a Canadian Indian activist are the first Canadian recipients of a grant from the Rosenberg Fund for Children (RFC).

The grant of $750 goes toward driving lessons for the children of Mary Pitawanakwat, an Ojibway-Potawatomi, who claimed racial slurs and sexual harassment as factors in her dismissal from the Human Rights Commission in Regina.

On a visit to Toronto, Robert Meeropol, the younger son of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg, who were executed on June 19, 1953, said the first Canadian grant is the result of his 1993 visit here when he learned of the problems facing Canadian Aboriginals.

Meeropol describes himself as "an orphan of the cold war." He and his older brother, Michael, were at first placed in an orphanage by relatives after their parents were executed.

Robert Meeropol

While in the orphanage, the children were denied the right to attend public schools in New Jersey.

Meeropol, executive director of RFC, said it was decided to waive geographical limits so that Brock and Robyn Pitawanakwat could take driving lessons.

He said the grant recognizes the common nature of the struggle of native Americans in the United States and Canada.

The RFC recently granted a total of $12,580 to benefit 42 children of parents who have been harassed, jailed, lost jobs or died in pursuit of their beliefs.

The Canadian Indian woman's struggle is not over, Meeropol said. "Unable to find work, she was forced onto welfare, suffered a stress-induced seizure, and underwent surgery for breast cancer. Her children were harassed at school and suffered from their poverty."

The tribunal looking into her complaint granted her two, rather than six years back pay, and ruled that she be given a job outside of Saskatchewan, which would cause her further hardship.

Meeropol and his brother have co-authored We Are Your Sons a retrospective look at the Rosenberg case.

For more information about the RFC call David Abramowitz, 789-5502.

Gelman goes by sound in his new Yiddish dictionary

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jack Gelman has a lot of chutzpah, or is it khootzpah, (nerve), because he is going to bat for the spelling kh instead of ch, even in Khelm (Chelm) and kholopitz, delicious cabbage rolls in any spelling.

Disregarding the spelling in most Yiddish dictionaries, Gelman has gone ahead with the kh in his new dictionary (his second), Yiddish a TwoWay Street.

"I go by the sound and it's definitely a kh sound," he said, with the proper guttural emphasis as he pronounced it.

Yiddish is only a half language, he explained. You have to see it and hear it to properly appreciate it.

Jack Gelman

The two-way street of the title comes from the different words that mean the same thing, depending on what part of Europe the Yiddish came from. As an example, oigen glaizer or brilen for eye glasses, or kholodetz or pecha for head cheese.

This dictionary has new words and expressions and a new Yiddish to English section. A 68-year-old paper products salesman, Gelman often checks pronunciation and spelling with card players at Earl Bales park. "They are the experts," he said.

He is a familiar figure in Jewish restaurants, selling them his products and writing new words, or new versions of old words, on napkins, scraps of paper or business cards.

At the price of $15, it is available in Jewish book stores and some synagogue gift shops.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Unlike most of his colleagues, the incoming rabbi of Beth Sholom Synagogue invites congregants to call him Rabbi Aaron (his first name) instead of Rabbi Flanzraich.

Although he makes light of his preferred form of address – "None of the other rabbis have my last name," he says with a smile – he believes his choice contributes to a more comfortable atmosphere, one that may well further his goal of creating "a caring, loving and spiritual" congregation that is responsive and relevant to members of all ages.

The May 29 move to Beth Sholom from the smaller Pride of Israel Synagogue will be bittersweet for the rabbi, whose surname, for the record, is pronounced Flanz-rye-sh. Under his leadership for the past four years, membership at Pride of Israel has grown to 750 families.

"I've made many wonderful connections here. It's a very amicable parting...[but] at this stage Beth Sholom represented a different kind of challenge and a different set of opportunities."

Rabbi Flanzraich, a 31-year-old father of two small children, joins Beth Sholom as the 1,000-family congregation is putting behind itself a serious challenge of its own. Last spring the congregation's then spiritual leader, Rabbi Irvin Brandwein, left the synagogue following a decision by the board of governors not to renew his contract, and a subsequent, unpleasant membership meeting requested by 140 of his supporters and attended by an estimated 500 people.

Under the interim leadership of Rabbi Irvin Beigel, the congregation went through a healing period, said Beth Sholom president Warren Kimel.

The search committee, with over a dozen members, proceeded cautiously as they sought a "young, dynamic leader...to grow with and

Rabbi Flanzraich's innovations at Pride of Israel – a Shabbat morning children's story hour, a Hebrew school program, a kosher food bank, adult education programs – were among the factors that made him, according to Kimel, an "outstanding candidate."

Before moving to Toronto – his wife Stacee's hometown,– the rabbi worked in his family's commercial printing business in New York, most recently as sales manager. At the same time, he served as an assistant rabbi at the Sayville Jewish Centre and an assistant regional director for B'nai Brith Youth Organization as the Eastern Long Island region grew from eight to 23 chapters.

"I have found that whatever Judaism has touched in my life, it has made more beautiful," said Rabbi Flanzraich. He hopes to help as many congregants as possible realize the same connection.

Although neither Beth Sholom nor Pride of Israel is affiliated with United Synagogue (the Conservative movement's umbrella organization), both congregations are representative of a traditional Conservative approach to Judaism, Rabbi Flanzraich said.

An alumnus of Bar-Ilan University – where he studied political science, English literature and Judaic studies – Rabbi Flanzraich was also a founding member of the Israeli Ice Hockey Federation. He still finds time to play the game once a week.

Rabbi Flanzraich was ordained in Israel, where he pursued his rabbinical studies, and is a member of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and the American Association of Rabbis.

"We have to realize that whether we're Reform, Conservative or Orthodox, we all need each other, and while we have differences, I believe we have more in common than we have different from one another," he said. "The biggest challenge that faces the Jewish community here is to step away from building ghettos...we have to maintain and develop a dialogue with each other."

Iranian Jew finds a new home at Toronto Heschel School

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Several years ago, Soheila Sabeti never dreamed she would be working in Toronto's vibrant Jewish community.

In 1985, Sabeti, 36, now administrative assistant at The Toronto Heschel School, an arts-based Hebrew day school, left Iran with her husband and children.

Trained as a physician in Iran, she says, "The only reason I was allowed to study medicine was because they needed women to treat women."

Arriving in Toronto via Israel, she knew she could not practise medicine, so Sabeti upgraded her skills in computer and office management. Last year, one month after Heschel opened its doors, she started working as a lunch room monitor and was then offered her present position.

Sabeti, the mother of three boys ages 15, 13 and 8, is the "first person people see when they come to the school. I speak to the parents and then direct them to the principal or general studies director."

Among her duties, she acts as school nurse; mediates between teachers and administration; orders supplies; arranges appointments; and organizes students' files.

"This job is a dream come true. I grew up in a religious family and I am an observant Jew so I have always wanted to work in the Jewish community."

Heschel School is a unique place, she says. "Everyone cares about everyone else. The school has rules and structure, but caring comes first. Rules can be adjusted, if necessary.

"The caring," says Sabeti, "comes from the top. The principal, the general studies director and the staff think about how they would want to be treated if they were a parent at the school. There are 106 students and we know every one by name. Parents do not have to introduce themselves when they call."

She misses practising medicine, she says, but loves interacting with the students. "It gives me a good feeling that what I am doing is helping. If I see a student smiling, I feel good."

Living in Toronto and working at the school, Sabeti says, is the "best alternative, since we cannot live in Iran. I like what this country has to offer my children. I am part of a lost generation and I must do my part to pave the road for the next generation.

"I do not want my children to forget their heritage and we do keep in touch with family in Iran, but we are Canadian citizens. This is our home and I want my children to call it their home."

Since coming to Toronto, her life has turned around, says Sabeti. "We had to go through a lot to get here but there is a happy ending. I am comfortable at work and I can see staying at the school for good."

McGill's Jewish teacher training gets boost

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish teacher training program at McGill University, whose future seemed precarious a few years ago, is a lot more secure now thanks to the resumption of funding from FEDERATION CJA and a heightened expectation of private support.

The program will receive for the next two years, and possibly for a third, a total of $35,000 annually, said Jewish Education Council (JEC) executive director Shlomo Shimon. Of that amount, $10,000 will come as a Combined Jewish Appeal allocation via the JEC budget, and $25,000 in the form of a grant from the Jewish Community Foundation.

The federation suspended its funding of the program some six or seven years ago, offering the reason that it was no longer producing enough graduates. "The numbers were so low, funding wasn't warranted," Shimon said.

No one, however, denied the value of the program, both the quality of the education it provided and the need for teachers at Jewish schools in Canada. The community had funded the program with McGill from the beginning, but its share decreased over the years to about $25,000 before it was suspended.

Last year, the program had 11 graduates, among the highest number ever in its 25-year history, said director Eric Caplan. This year, the program has 17 students, of whom one will graduate in June and another two in October, he said.

Caplan is confident the program's enrolment will grow and is projecting five or six graduates next year and eight or nine the following year.

Shimon said funding has also been restored because of the greater willingness of the program to respond to the needs of the community. Caplan has created a 25-member community liaison committee to act as a sounding board for educators and community officials who want to have input in the program.

The funding has been extended with the understanding that the program will become self-sufficient in that time, Shimon said. He believes the program should benefit from the $2-million endowment created recently with donations by the Cummings family and Leanor and Alvin Segal in the Jewish studies department.

According to Gershon Hundert, holder of the position of Montreal Jewish community professor of Jewish studies, who was instrumental in securing the donation, the endowment will not benefit the teacher training program, which continues to seek its own patron(s).

The $35,000 community funding, which will begin Aug. 1, will enable the program to have a full-time director, something it has not had for some years, Caplan said.

"The funding has important symbolic value because it represents a return of the relationship between the program and the community. Being more integrated into the community is important for overall fundraising," he said. "The distance that existed, at least institutionally, is closing, if not closed." And while the $2-million endowment may not directly benefit the teacher training program, the donation has "created a certain momentum" for additional fundraising, Caplan said.

Funding from the community may also give the program more leverage when it negotiates the funding it gets from McGill, Caplan said.

This fall, the program's curriculum will be changed. Currently, graduates receive a bachelor of education degree that enables them to teach only Jewish studies at the elementary or high school level. In future, the program will train teachers for work in Jewish or general studies.

The program will lengthen from three to four years, during which students will receive instruction in math, science and other secular subjects and get more practical teaching experience, but continue to receive the same amount of Jewish studies instruction, he said. "None of these changes is at the expense of existing standards. They will spend no less time on Jewish studies. They will have to obtain the exact same number of Jewish studies credits as now."

Caplan said that "theoretically" the new curriculum will prepare graduates for work in any school and may make the program more attractive.

While Toronto's York University trains elementary Jewish school teachers, McGill remains the only school in Canada educating teachers for Jewish high schools and one of only about 10 such institutions in North America, Caplan said.

Graduates are virtually assured of employment because of the growth of Jewish education and the declining number of young Jews opting for a teaching career.

TORONTO — An endowed chair in medieval Jewish studies has been established in the Department of Near and Middle Eastern Civilizations at the University of Toronto's Faculty of Arts and Science.

The $1-million gift from Senator Jerry Grafstein and his wife Carole will create the Senator Jerahmiel S. and Carole S. Grafstein Chair in Medieval Jewish Studies. The gift will be matched by U of T to create an endowment of $2 million.

The chair will make a significant contribution to the scholarship on medieval Jewry and will increase the profile of the topic in U of T and beyond. In teaching, the chairholder will integrate medieval Jewish studies into the curriculum of Near and Middle Eastern civilizations as well as the Jewish studies program.

"This generous gift builds on a significant foundation of research and teaching in Jewish studies across the Faculty of Arts and Science," said Carl Amrhein, dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science. "This, combined with the university's cross-disciplinary Centre for Medieval Studies, will enable the chairholder to not only contribute to specialized teaching and research in his or her home department, but in a number of related disciplines."

"It is our hope that the creation of this new core of medieval Jewish studies will act as a catalyst to a deeper understanding of the evolution of our humanistic values," said Grafstein. "The new chair will assist the University of Toronto to further solidify itself as a leader across the spectrum of disciplines medieval studies encompasses."

New charges laid in cemetery vandalism case

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

ST. CATHARINES — The cousin of a man charged with desecrating this city's only Jewish cemetery late last month was arrested last week for vandalizing the same cemetery.

Niagara Regional Police made the arrest at the front door of B'nai Israel Synagogue, after the shul's rabbi, Martin Applebaum, received a telephone call from someone asking for a meeting.

Rabbi Applebaum told The CJN he was suspicious of the call, and alerted police, who arrested a suspect.

Members of the 150-family Jewish community here learned of the arrest as they gathered on the front steps of St. Catharines city hall for a press conference last Wednesday, along with Mayor Tim Rigby, Niagara Regional Police Chief Grant Waddell, Rabbi Applebaum, congregation president Sam Walters and Michael Silverman of Canadian Jewish Congress, (CJC) Ontario region.

Police arrested and charged Daniel Youmans, 30, of St. Catharines, with mischief under $5,000 and 11 counts of causing indignity to human remains, in connection with the second desecration.

Youmans is a cousin of Warren Soles, 20, who is charged with vandalizing the cemetery the first time, on April 25.

In that incident, 43 headstones were toppled or damaged, windows smashed and flower beds trampled.

Damage was estimated at between $5,000 and $8,000.

Soles was charged with mischief over $5,000, attempted break and enter and possession of a dangerous weapon.

But in an unusual move, police last week further charged him with 40 counts of causing indignity to human remains.

Soles was in jail awaiting a bail hearing when the second attack occurred just two days later.

Cemetery officials discovered that of the 16 headstones that had been righted from the first attack, 11 were turned over again.

Both men are scheduled to appear in court this week.

Police are considering the first attack a hate crime, which would allow a judge to impose a stiffer sentence.

Police say they are investigating the second occurrence to determine whether it too constituted a hate crime.

Soles is affiliated with several neo-Nazi organizations, police said.

He said a "major" memorial and re-dedication service will take place at the cemetery in the coming weeks, involving members of government and representatives of faith groups.

Doctor not responsible for arsons

CJN News Services

LONDON, Ont. — A Jewish doctor who set two fires at local synagogues in February has been found not criminally responsible because of a long-standing mental disorder.

In a recent ruling, provincial court Judge Alan Baker ruled that 38-year-old Jonathan Bishinsky suffered from a manic-depressive disorder, with related psychotic delusions when he set the fires on Feb. 26.

The court accepted the testimony of forensic psychiatrist Dr. Simon Chiu that Bishinsky, a cardiologist, poses no threat to society as long as he is under treatment and taking medication.

The court gave Bishinsky a conditional discharge and said he may continue working as long as he is monitored.

At both scenes, officials had found cardboard boxes containing paper, twigs and artificial fire logs.

Israel's 50th celebrated in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Yitzhak Rabin High School and Congregation Agudath Israel recently joined forces to mark the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel as well as the 50th anniversary of the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Dr. Adolfo Roitman, curator of the Dead Sea Scrolls, presented an audiovisual program on the discovery of the scrolls and the latest developments in dating, photographing and deciphering them.

Curator visits

Roitman, who holds a PhD in ancient Jewish thought from the Hebrew University, and a rabbinical diploma from the Latin-American Rabbinical Seminary, has been curator of the Shrine of the Book in the Israel Museum since 1994.

He described the largest international convention ever held on the Dead Sea Scrolls which he hosted in Jerusalem last year. Jewish scholars and Christian clergy from around the world, he said, presented papers and discussed the ancient manuscripts.

Hadassah-WIZO honors women parliamentarians

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

'Education is the key to success of women'

OTTAWA — As part of its national executive meetings, Canadian Hadassah-WIZO held a recent luncheon at the Chateau Laurier Hotel to honor women parliamentarians, judges and ambassadors.

The 150 guests were welcomed in English by national president Patricia Joy Albert and in French by national vice-president Diana Shadowitz.

The luncheon was held to mark the 80th anniversary of the founding of Hadassah-WIZO and the 50th anniversary of the establishment of the State of Israel.

Albert said that to celebrate the two anniversaries, the organization is setting up a scholarship for women's studies at the University of Ottawa.

Adina Sultan, wife of David Sultan, Israeli ambassador to Canada, delivered greetings from the State of Israel.

Sultan, who had visited some of WIZO's projects in Israel prior to coming to Canada, said "I was very much impressed with what I saw and I believe that you should be very proud of these institutions. We are grateful for what the organization has done in the past and continues to do."

Guest speaker Hedy Fry, secretary of state for multiculturalism and the status of women said "education is key to the success and advancement of women across the world, around the world, and here in Canada."

Fry was presented with a Hadassah-WIZO Women to Women pin and said "I have trees growing in Israel; I have my name on an ophthalmology ward in Israel. Through you, I am contributing in an even bigger way outside of Canada than I could ever have done otherwise."

Special presentations were made to the honored guests. Among these were MP Sheila Finestone; Susana Ruiz Cerutti, ambassador of the Argentine Republic to Canada; Senator Erminie Joy Cohen; MP Shaughnessy Cohen; Michelle Falardeau-Ramsay, chief commissioner, Canadian Human Rights Commission; and Judy Gingell, commissioner of the Yukon Territory.

Marion Mayman, national vice-president, made the closing remarks.

MONTREAL — Antonia Robinson, a leader and active member of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (NCJW) for almost 60 years, who inspired many of its pioneering community projects, died recently less than a month away from her 103rd birthday.

Known as "Tony," Robinson was president of the NCJW's Montreal section from 1944-48 and again from 1949-50, and national president from 1955-57. She served as president of the International Council of Jewish Women (ICJW) from 1957-63, the first Canadian elected to the position, and continued to sit as one of its officers almost until her death.

Robinson, wife of the late Quebec Superior Court Justice Benjamin Robinson, first became involved in community work during World War II helping Jewish refugees and orphans from Europe resettle in Montreal.

Among the innovative projects launched while she was Montreal president were a children's library in a largely immigrant district and the first golden age clubs for seniors. The NCJW Tony Robinson Boy's and Girls' Library still exists on Darlington Avenue, and the Golden Age Association has grown into a major agency with thousands of members.

תינוק לא הורגים פעמיים
על שלוליות שופכין בסברה ושתילה
שם העברתם כמויות של בני אדם
הראויות להתכבד
מעולם החי לעולם האמת.
... זנב דק של ירח בן ראשית החדש היה תלוי
מעל למחנות.
חיילינו שלנו האירו את המקום במורים
כאור יום.
"לחזור למחנה, מארש!" צוה החיל
לנשים הצורחות מסברה ושתילה.
היו לו פקודות למלא.
והילדים היו כבר מונחים בשלוליות הסחי,
פיהם פעור
שלוים
איש לא יגע בהם לרעה.

"הקמתה של מדינת ישראל עשתה צדק ליהודים אבל לוותה בעוול נורא לפלשתינאים"... "אילו היה העולם מתנהל לפי כללי הצדק, היתה ישראל צריכה לקום על חורבותיהן של ברלין והמבורג, אבל איש לא העלה על הדעת אפשרות כזאת, לא אנחנו ולא אומות העולם." "במשך מלחמת העצמאות איבדו את ביתם ויצאו לגלות כמחצית מערביי הארץ. המנהיגות שלנו חשבה שבעולם שבו כל דאלים גבר, פעם אחת באלפיים שנה מותר גם ליהודים להיות הבריונים של ההיסטוריה. חמישים שנה אנחנו מנסים למחוק מהתודעה את העוול הזה. פיתחנו כמה מנגנוני הגנה ויצרנו קני מידה כאילו מוסריים שהכשירו את העוול, אבל בעיקר מחקנו אותו מהתודעה"... "המצאנו שאלות סרק, כמו האם גורשו הערבים במלחמת העצמאות או ברחו מרצונם? אין ספק שחלקם גורשו וחלקם ברחו"... " המצאנו קנה מידה חדש לזכויות של אנשים על רכושם: מי שברח הפסיד. לפי קנה המידה המוסרי המפוקפק הזה, הפלשתינאים הפסידו את זכויותיהם על ארץ ישראל"...

Reject pluralism: UK chief rabbi

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of Great Britain and the United Kingdom, called on Jews to support inclusivism and reject pluralism.

"The solution to the present disunity within the Jewish people is to embrace only one Judaism, but to be tolerant of the way in which other Jews worship."

The chief rabbi was speaking at a recent community lecture in the Norman Rothstein Theatre at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver. The lecture, sponsored by Lubavitch of British Columbia and the Lohn Foundation, attracted some 250 people.

Rabbi Sacks began his speech on Healing the Rifts in the Jewish People, Pluralism or Inclusivism with a word of caution: "The only approach we can take should be based on honesty, no matter how painful. That way will allow us to see each other as members of a single extended Jewish family."

He noted the long history of Jewish disunity. "Three times the Jewish people have been sent into exile, and each time it was due to internal divisions," he said.

The examples he cited included Joseph and his brothers, where sibling rivalry led to the enslavement of the Jewish people in Egypt; the division of Israel into two kingdoms, of which only the northern kingdom survived; and internal dissension during the Roman siege of Jerusalem, which led to the loss of the Second Temple and 1,900 years of exile.

"Greater powers, such as Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union, have been unable to destroy us," said Rabbi Sacks. "We survived all of them. Only we can destroy ourselves."

According to the Rabbi Sacks, the unity of the Jewish people has been based on religious commitment. "Until the 19th century, Torah was the portable homeland of the Jewish people," he said.

During the 19th century, however, there arose a new and radical redefinition of Jewish identity, one of the results of which was religious disunity. "One hundred years later, the situation is the same as it was in the 19th century, except that it has been intensified."

In the past, Rabbi Sacks said, disunity was dealt with in one of two ways. "There was the 'exclusivist' approach, in which the majority told dissenters, 'It's our way or the highway.' But there was also an 'inclusivist' tack, based on tolerance and open-mindedness, and more accepting of Jewish non-conformity

"Not all Judaisms are Judaism, but all Jews are Jews, that was the watchword of the inclusivists," the rabbi said.

"Concentrating on people allowed us to preserve the integrity of our faith."

The late 20th century concept of pluralism, which holds that there is more than one form of Judaism and that they are all equally valid, is opposed to inclusivism.

He said the concept of pluralism founders on the issue of conversion.

"Imagine when someone becomes a citizen of Canada," he said. "You can't have more than one standard of citizenship. It's the same with Judaism. You can have only one standard."

Rabbi Sacks concluded with a suggestion: "We as Jews need to follow the ways of peace, and show respect for one another."

Even though we may not follow Jewish tradition, we should not reject it, he said. "We must keep Jewish heritage alive by staying open to Judaism and to every Jew."

Ottawa celebrates Israel's 50th

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The 1,500 tickets for Israel's 50th anniversary celebration were sold out weeks before the event.

This year's Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration was preceded by a solemn Yom Hazikaron memorial ceremony. Everything was choreographed by a large committee of volunteers, headed by chair Naomi Lipsky Cracower, together with staff members of the Jewish Community Centre and the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Halr.

Local radio personality Saul Jacobson acted as MC, along with Max Lipson. The Yom Hazikaron program included the lighting of a memorial flame by Barbara Farber, president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Halr; followed by a minute of silence; a rendition of Bab El Wad by Max Lipson by Cantor Daniel Benlolo and the Ottawa Community Choir; and a wreath laying ceremony.

Following the raising of the flag, and Hatikvah, the shofar was blown to signify the end of mourning and beginning of celebration.

David Sultan, the ambassador of Israel to Canada, brought greetings to the audience. "By every yardstick, the 50 years we are marking today has been a success story...To those who point out that these achievements have not been flawless, my answer is that even miracles have their limits. We have every reason to be proud of our state and our people."

The support and encouragement of the Jews around the world have helped to make this miracle of Israel possible, he added. "Israel belongs and will always belong to all the Jewish people."

"This occasion also marks 50 years of friendship between Canada and Israel and therefore I am delighted to bring greetings," he continued. "We have so much in common: our pluralistic democracy, our high-tech ambitions, our free-trade agreements. The hope is that Israel continues to grow and flourish, increasingly at peace with its neighbors."

The lights were dimmed, and as the names of all of Ottawa's Jewish organizations were read aloud, representatives of the various groups held up a light. Immediately following this Points of Light interlude, Sultan lit the 50th candle on a birthday cake.

Festivities in Halifax

By JOEL JACOBSON

HALIFAX — More than 200 members of the Halifax Jewish community celebrated Israel's 50th anniversary at Beth Israel Synagogue.

The evening featured an Israeli style supper of hummus, falafel, salads and three birthday cakes; and Israeli music by Montreal entertainers The Shalom Duo. It was sponsored by the Atlantic Jewish Council.

Gali Brock, who was born in Israel and has lived in Halifax for four years, said the event made her homesick. "Israel has achieved so much in such a short time. I'm very hopeful for the future."

Mani Suissa, who lived in Israel for 21 years before moving to Canada said, "I've never left Israel, but I'm still here. I'm thrilled Israel is prospering after 50 years."

Halifax lawyer Joel Pink, a one-time visitor to Israel said, "I was impressed how a country that had been built in a desert is viable in all areas of agriculture. And they blended the old with the new."

Prior to their performance, The Shalom Duo (Yehuda Pinto and Jacques Abicidan) led the crowd in a rendition of Hatikvah. "Would we like to be in Israel tonight?" they said. "Oh, yeah! But we're privileged to deliver the spirit 10,000 miles away from Israel to you. This gives it an authentic touch."

New Child Support Guidelines contain hidden complexities

In the April 9 issue we noted that for any new child support agreements or Court Orders, the basic monthly amount payable is not tax deductible. Moreover, the amount of child support is determined by a Table based on the payer's gross income, the number of dependent children, and the province in which the paying spouse ordinarily resides. If the paying spouse's residence is unknown or if this spouse resides outside of Canada, then the Court applies the Table for the province in which the recipient spouse resides.

Each province has a different Table. For instance, the non-custodial parent in Ontario who earns $100,000 and has three children pays $1,613 monthly to the custodial parent (as compared to $1,592 in B.C.), except in certain narrowly defined situations.

Split custody and other exceptions

One of these situations is called "split custody". If one or more children reside with each parent, then the Guidelines demand that the Court assess the gross incomes of each parent. If, after the incomes of both parents have been assessed and the Tables applied, the wife owes the husband $300 monthly for one child living with him, but is in turn owed $1,613 monthly for the three children living with her, then the "net" amount payable by the spouse with whom the one child resides is $1,313 monthly.

What many parents and commentators fail to realize is that these basic monthly payments can be treated under the new legislation as minimum, not maximum, obligations. Under the Guidelines, a Court can order "add-ons" or extras for: (a) child-care expenses incurred as a result of the custodial parent's employment, illness, disability, or education or training for employment; (b) medical and dental insurance premiums attributable to the child; (c) health-related expenses not covered by medicare or private insurance, including orthodontic care, glasses and prescription drugs; (d) extraordinary expenses for primary or secondary school education, which in certain cases can mean a contribution towards private school tuition, including Hebrew Day or Sunday schools; (e) post-secondary education; (f) extraordinary expenses for extracurricular activities.

If the Court feels that these expenses should be paid as child support, then they are shared in proportion to the parents' respective gross yearly incomes. However, before these amounts are allocated, one must first deduct from the costs any contribution that the child can make, given his or her means.

If these "extra" contributions are paid directly to the receiving spouse each month, then the province's Government enforcement agency (which in Ontario is the Family Responsibility Office) will enforce such an agreement or Court Order. For example, if the basic "Table" amount is $1,613 monthly plus an additional $200 for ballet lessons, then the agreement or Order should stipulate that the total monthly payment is $1,813. Then, in the event the Government agency seizes part of the payer's wages, tax refund or other income, it will do so with a view to satisfying a monthly payment of $1,813. However, if the agreement or Order allows for the ballet lessons to be paid directly to the Ballet School in the amount of $2,400 yearly — or as a separate payment — then the Government often does not enforce this payment, notwithstanding the recipient's legal entitlement to it. In this case the Government will only enforce the basic payment of $1,613.

Enforceability of payments

Child support is becoming as complex as the computation of income tax. Ironically, the Guidelines were intended to simplify the process.

LITERARY SCENE

In the first in this three-part series on the Canadian-Jewish literary scene past and present, writer Bill Gladstone examines the phenomenal international success of Anne Michaels' 1996 novel Fugitive Pieces and discusses the centrality of Holocaust themes in the current Jewish literary imagination.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Anne Michaels' bestselling novel Fugitive Pieces tells the story of Jakob Beer, a Polish-Jewish child who, alone of his family, survives the Nazi onslaught. Jakob is rescued by Athos, a Greek archeologist who nurses the child's traumatized spirit back to health. The duo go to Greece, and then to Toronto, where they rebuild their lives.

Michaels, a Toronto writer who has also produced two slim volumes of poems, took 10 years to complete the manuscript for what would be her first novel. In interviews, she has explained that the writing took a decade because she wanted the full meaning and significance of the story to seep from her subconscious onto the printed page.

Her publisher, McClelland & Stewart Inc. of Toronto (M&S), was quick to accept the manuscript. Ellen Seligman, the company's editorial director for fiction, had seen an early draft when "Anne hadn't yet found the structure that she wanted. Six years later, when she revised it and brought it to me, I signed it up and worked very closely with her in the final stages of the book's completion."

Seligman, who also edits Margaret Atwood, Michael Ondaatje and Jane Urquhart, chooses not to discuss the nature of the editing she performs on any particular book. However, she does divulge that in the late stages of production of Fugitive Pieces, as the editors and artists were conceptualizing its appearance in the world, "There was certainly a growing sense that this book was somehow extraordinary.

"On the other hand, there was also some uncertainty about how it would do because it was a first novel. But the moment that people began reading it – from the very first responses – it was clear that the reaction would be very extraordinary and very widespread."

According to M&S publicity manager Kelly Hechler, the excitement over Fugitive Pieces began even before it was published, when Seligman took the manuscript to various publishers at the influential Frankfurt Book Fair in late 1995.

"Right off the bat, you had three of the world's most esteemed editors excited about this book," says Hechler. "And from there, it leaked to the media and you had this big buzz that trickled down to booksellers, many of whom read the book in galleys and talked about it with their customers. And then customers began to read the book and that incredible thing started to happen called word of mouth."

In the less than two years since Fugitive Piece's initial publication, M&S has reprinted it nine times and sold about 100,000 copies in Canada. It has been on the Globe and Mail's bestseller list for most of that time. (In the Canadian book industry, sales of 5,000 copies are traditionally considered enough to deem a book a bestseller.) Fugitive Pieces has also won at least nine major literary prizes, including the Martin and Beatrice Fisher Award of the 1997 Jewish Book Awards in Toronto; the 1997 City of Toronto Book Award; a Trillium Prize with a cash value of $10,000; the Lannan Literary Award for Fiction, worth $75,000 (US); and the British Orange Prize for Fiction by Women, worth about $66,000.

And Fugitive Pieces is still going strong. Last month in England, it netted the 1997 Jewish Quarterly Prize for Fiction, worth about $9,000. Including this latest purse, the book has garnered an estimated $250,000 in prize money. Sales of some foreign-language rights have also reportedly earned six-figure amounts. So far, the novel has been published in 17 languages, including German, Hebrew, Japanese, Chinese and some Scandinavian tongues, and has been distributed in some 25 countries. Not surprisingly, it has done especially well in Germany, where the Holocaust remains an inescapable cultural issue of colossal proportions.

"It's impossible to compare this success to anything," Hechler remarks. "This is a first novel by a relatively unknown writer. She was a poet with two previous books with very modest sales. So these sales figures are incomparable."

Although Fugitive Pieces is one of the most successful books yet to emerge from the astonishingly prolific Canadian-Jewish literary sphere, Michaels disputes the definition of Fugitive Pieces as a specifically Jewish book and prefers not to acknowledge her Jewishness in interviews. Instead she makes the reasonable assertion that the subject is universal and the book could have been written by anyone, a Greek Catholic for instance.

Anne Michaels

But her finely wrought prose carries strong Judaic philosophical elements along with its highly poetic quality. Some note that Michaels' style bears similarities to that of Michael Ondaatje; many agree that Fugitive Pieces is a deep and complex book.

"It's an extended poem in many ways," says Ruby Newman, a professor of women's studies, humanities and Jewish studies at York University. "It needs to be studied; it can't be read right through. As an extended poem, it requires an enormous effort to 'unpack' it. Like many people, I didn't find it easy when I first started reading it."

Despite the noteworthy attributes of Fugitive Pieces, a good part of its phenomenal success around the world invariably stems from the author's choice of subject matter. Once, few writers dared to tread into the sacred ground of the Holocaust, a thing supposedly beyond the power of language to describe. Many, perhaps, were mindful of German philosopher Theodor Adorno's famous decree that there can be "no poetry after Auschwitz." For roughly 30 years after the Shoah, the literary world at large, with only a handful of exceptions, kept a respectful quiet, unwilling to desecrate or diminish the unspeakable pain of the victims.

But now, as Michaels has pointed out, the moral imperative has shifted, and as the last generation of survivors fade into history, many creative artists seem to feel compelled to explore the subject in depth. In this era of recovered Swiss gold and looted art treasures, war-crimes trials, Schindler's List and Holocaust museums popping up like sacred shrines, Jewish popular culture seems focused on the Holocaust and its aftermath as never before, a therapeutic fixation shared by Western popular culture as a whole.

Dr. Shel Krakofsky, former editor of the Canadian Jewish literary journal Parchment, notes that roughly 70 percent of the submissions he used to receive at Parchment fell into the category of Holocaust literature.

Parchment's current editor, Adam Fuerstenberg, a professor of English literature at Ryerson Polytechnical University in Toronto, acknowledges that "the Holocaust or some aspect of it" is still the predominant theme of material received at Parchment. (Other major themes, he says, include the clash between traditional Jewish religious practices and modernity, and the complexities and frustrations associated with Israel.)

"It's hard to put out a Jewish representative anthology these days because so much is Holocaust stuff," Krakofsky observes. "People say, 'I'm a Jew; so I'll fight the Nazis, new and old.' And that's all they know; they don't know what the morning prayer is."

Last year, a Parchment short story shared first prize in the annual Journey Prize, worth $10,000. Maladies of The Inner Ear, by Gabriella Goliger, describes the plight of an elderly German-Jewish woman who is tormented by tinnitus, a persistent ringing in the ears, and by memories of her youth in Germany just before World War II.

At The Canadian Jewish News, which sponsors an annual literary supplement at Passover, approximately 80 percent of submissions received relate to the Holocaust, says CJN Editor Mordechai Ben-Dat. That is seemingly a strong indication of how deeply the Shoah has affected the contemporary Jewish literary imagination and perhaps temporarily distracted it from more traditional or original themes. For many creators and shapers of Jewish culture, apparently, the smoke from the chimneys of Auschwitz still seems to block out the sun.

Such signs point to the magnitude of the tragedy and its ability to shape our lives and culture after more than half a century. Is anyone still unconvinced of the veracity of Emil Fackenheim's most perceptive 614th mitzvah, "Thou shalt not give Hitler a posthumous victory" by forgetting?

Although thematically mired in the Holocaust, Fugitive Pieces focuses on the long, slow process of restoration, in a survivor, of normal human feelings of decency and trust in the post-Holocaust world. Although critics may complain that the book's presentation of a survivor who fully heals is unrealistic, Fugitive Pieces nonetheless carries the notion that it is possible, in time, to transcend the Holocaust, to recover from it, to rise above it and to see beyond it.

Marshall McLuhan called it "looking in the rearview mirror," a culture's attempt to look backwards for its bearings as it surges ahead. It is highly significant that, paralleling the heightened literary interest in the Holocaust are various popular cultural movements that seem to reach backwards in time to pre-Holocaust Jewish life in Eastern Europe. The continuing revival of Yiddish, the burgeoning popularity of klezmer music, the rise of interest in Jewish genealogy – all of these are attempts to recover the lost worlds of the past, to connect with life rather than death.

The current popular preoccupation with the Holocaust may also be regarded as an attempt to absolve guilt. North American Jews know they did not do enough to try to save their European cousins from destruction, nor to assist the survivors in establishing new lives here. Perhaps we are rushing to obey Fackenheim's 614th commandment now to atone for our previous sins of omission.

Final currency reforms unveiled by Neeman

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — As of this week, Israelis will be able to carry out any transaction in any currency at home or abroad, Finance Minister Yaakov Neeman announced at a press conference at Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's office.

Meanwhile, two foreign financial institutions issued shekel-denominated bonds on the European market for the first time.

The International Finance Corporation sold one-year bonds worth NIS 200 million, while Merrill Lynch sold a further NIS 175 million.

The central bank's supervisor of foreign currency will next week issue a general permit enabling the following changes:

• Israelis will be allowed to freely invest overseas, including in real estate.

Yaakov Ne'eman

• Citizens and companies will be able to hold bank accounts abroad in shekels or foreign currency. Until now this had been restricted to exporters.

• All restrictions on quantities of unilateral transfers overseas will be abolished. This includes gifts and transfers abroad by residents who emigrated.

• Israelis will be able to make payments here to anyone by cash or cheque in any currency.

• Israelis will be able to take any sum of shekels out of the country.

• The need to provide documentation when carrying out a transaction in any currency with a non-resident with be abolished. However, documentation will be required at a later date for analyzing capital flow.

• Citizens will be able to use credit cards via overseas intermediaries and not just through local banks.

Along with the new measures, the government intends taxing interest on foreign accounts and on receipts from property rented out by Israelis overseas. Central bank officials say these measures will be put into effect once the required legislation is passed by the Knesset.

Although the measures announced did not include the relaxing of regulations for institutional investors, Frenkel said they will eventually be allowed to invest additional sums overseas.

Another remaining restriction prevents foreigners from dealing in options and futures for more than 30 days. This restriction will also be lifted "very soon," according to Neeman.

"The decision is a dramatic decision in the sense that it changes the basic conception underlying the regime of our foreign exchange controls," said Netanyahu.

In the weeks ahead of the announcement the shekel fluctuated considerably. Analysts said this was the result of uncertainty about the contents of the package.

Palestinians can do more to combat terrorism: report

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — The Palestinian Authority cooperated with Israel to combat terrorism last year, but it still needs to make greater efforts in this area, according to a recent State Department report.

In its annual report, Patterns of Global Terrorism, the State Department also said that despite Syria's stated commitment to the peace process, Damascus has not acted to stop anti-Israeli attacks by the Islamic fundamentalist group Hezbollah and other terrorist groups.

Some 304 acts of international terrorism occurred last year, eight more than in 1996, the State Department said. But the figure for 1997 was still one of the lowest annual totals recorded since 1971, when the State department began keeping track of such acts.

The attacks killed 221 people, compared with 312 in 1996 and 177 in 1995.

The number of wounded also was down as compared with last year – 693 as opposed to 2,912.

The report said the Middle East witnessed some of the world's most horrific acts of terrorism in 1997, including three deadly suicide bombing attacks carried out against Israelis by Hamas that killed 24 and wounded more than 420.

The region also had the largest number of terrorist victims – 105 dead and 375 wounded. The deadliest attack of the year occurred at a temple in Luxor, Egypt, where Islamic extremists slaughtered 62 people.

As Israel continued to face terrorist attacks by Palestinian groups opposed to the peace process, the Palestinian Authority pre-empted several anti-Israeli attacks, including several planned suicide bombings, the report said.

"At the same time, more effort is needed by the PA to enhance its bilateral cooperation with Israel and its unilateral fight against terrorism," the report said.

Iran remained the world's leading "state sponsor of terrorism," carrying out at least 13 assassinations, according to the report.

The State Department designated the same seven countries as last year – Iran, Cuba, Iraq, Libya, North Korea, Sudan and Syria – as state sponsors of terrorism, making them subject to U.S. sanctions.

It said there was no evidence directly linking Cuba, Iraq, North Korea or Syria to terrorist acts last year, but that those countries continued to harbor terrorists.

The report said Syria continues to provide safe haven and support for several terrorist groups, while it "assists the resupply of Hezbollah and Palestinian rejectionist groups operating in Lebanon."

German far-right party scores at polls

By DEIDRE BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Alarm bells are sounding after a right-wing party scored an unexpectedly strong showing in a German state election.

Five months before German national elections, the German People's Union last week scored the largest percentage of the vote won by a far-right party in any state election held in the country since World War II.

Experts on right-wing extremism estimate there is about a 15 percent right-wing voter potential in Germany, similar to that in other European countries such as France and Austria. Right-wing parties in those countries are strongly represented at the state level and have become a force in national politics.

But until now, far-right parties in Germany have had little success capitalizing on the nationalist and racist sentiments that continue to fuel right-wing violence here.

Poor organization, a lack of charismatic leaders and political infighting have splintered the political strength of the leading right-wing parties.

But even if no such party can mobilize within the next five months, the necessary five percent of the vote needed to enter the federal parliament, the success of the People's Union is causing shifts in the campaign focus of the major parties.

After last Sunday's election, the conservative Christian Social Union, a member of Bonn's ruling conservative coalition, called for more emphasis on law and order and topics targeting the electorate's national identity in order to counter voter drift toward the far right.

Political observers say the strong showing of the People's Union has further weakened the re-election chances of Chancellor Helmut Kohl.

Many area residents blame the conservative Bonn government's economic policies for unemployment rates as high as 40 percent in some regions of eastern Germany.

As a result of this anger, Kohl's Christian Democratic Union captured just 22 percent of the vote in the state election, barely ahead of the Communist party. The opposition Social Democrats emerged victorious, with about 37 percent of the vote.

Gerhard Schroeder, the Social Democratic Party candidate for chancellor, has a substantial lead so far in national polls, and last Sunday's vote is likely to increase pressure on Kohl to step aside after 16 years at the helm and make room for a younger candidate to represent his party in the fall elections.

The xenophobic campaign mounted by the People's Union was especially popular with younger Germans: Exit polls show it was the most popular party for voters under 30, capturing 27 percent of their votes.

Ignatz Bubis, chairman of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, said he is alarmed that 32 percent of the voters between the ages of 18 and 24 backed the People's Union.

"Until now, it was a taboo," he said in an interview. "Many people said they could imagine voting for a right-wing party, but they did not. Now they have done it."

Bubis charges that the People's Union is the most racist and anti-Semitic of Germany's far-right parties.

Israel's ambassador to Germany, Avi Primor, designated the People's Union as a party of people "who want to revive the ghosts of the past."

He warned the German people not to be indifferent to the electoral success of the far right.

The surprise showing of the People's Union in Saxony-Anhalt marks the first time since Germany's 1990 unification that a far right party has entered one of the five eastern German state parliaments.

Until this election, the People's Union had few members and no political significance in these five states. During the campaign, the party distributed large amounts of literature with campaign slogans such as "Get Rid of Criminal Foreigners" and "German Money for German Tasks."

Talks on survivors' claims begin

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Talks to resolve Holocaust survivors' claims against Swiss banks have opened – but no quick settlement is in sight.

The first round of talks, held in Washington under U.S. State Department auspices, comes on the heels of a pledge last month by Switzerland's three largest banks to negotiate a settlement that could end three multi-billion dollar class-action lawsuits and boycott threats by U.S. states and cities.

Representatives of Swiss Bank Corp., Union Bank of Switzerland and Credit Suisse, the World Jewish Congress and class-action lawyers met for more than six hours Monday in what some characterized as a positive sign.

But for now, neither side is talking. The U.S. undersecretary of state for economic affairs, Stuart Eizenstat, who arranged the meeting, issued a brief statement saying each of the parties signed an agreement to not comment publicly on the talks.

"This is a process that is complicated and will take some time," said Eizenstat, the Clinton administration's specialist on Holocaust restitution issues.

Since reaching an agreement in principle last month to start negotiations, the two sides have been deeply divided over what assets should even be on the table.

Jewish officials want the banks to agree to a global settlement – a lump sum payment covering bank deposits, insurance policies, confiscated real estate, artworks and other looted assets, as well as compensation for slave labor.

The banks, however, say they are only willing to address those claims related to the banks themselves.

The other claims could be passed along to the Swiss government, which remains opposed to the idea of a global settlement and is not a direct party to the negotiations. A representative of the Swiss banks said, however, that the banks do not intend to discuss any liabilities of the Swiss government or the Swiss National Bank.

The banks, meanwhile, find themselves in a precarious position back home. Some Swiss observers are questioning whether the banks might be stabbing the rest of the country in the back by arranging their own settlement.

Jewish officials say it is not their concern how the Swiss decide to reconcile that issue.

As for the amount of the cheque, Jewish officials have declined to specify what they want, though some sources have said an appropriate settlement could range between $1 billion and $3 billion.

The negotiators are expected to reconvene next week.

In a related development, the State Department postponed until later this month the release of a new report about gold transactions between Nazi Germany and wartime neutrals.

Netanyahu in confident mood as popularity rises

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Correspondent

In his interview with The CJN last week, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was in a confident mood. This reflected his rise in popularity, not only with those predisposed towards right-wing thinking, but also with the non-committed voters who supported him at the time of the last election, but later became disenchanted with the Likud-led government over the failing peace process and the worsening economic situation.

A few months ago, which is a long time in politics, Netanyahu's popularity was at an all-time low. His coalition majority in the Knesset was being eroded almost daily. The strength of the right wing was being undermined by the resignations of his coalition partners, particularly foreign minister David Levy.

It is difficult to pinpoint the nadir of Netanyahu's popularity, but about two months ago it became clear that internal dissent was tearing the nation apart and detracting from the ability of the government to handle the stop-go negotiations in the peace process.

British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook, who came to Israel just over a month ago, antagonized every Israeli by his refusal to make the customary visit to the Holocaust Memorial at Yad Vashem and his subsequent meeting with Palestinian officials at Har Choma. Netanyahu was furious and backed out of a state dinner for Cook in order to protest the foreign secretary's arrogance.

It was clear that Netanyahu was showing a resolve and a consistency with his demand for security for Israel above all other considerations. In direct reference to his forthcoming London meeting he said, "Nothing will make me change when the issue of Israeli security is at stake. If I don't capitulate, will I be branded an obstacle to peace? Of course. I am already branded with this. I don't care. I am standing up for Israel's security interest.

"To treat the matter of security lightly is to abdicate our responsibilities as a government.. Jews everywhere must remain united in demanding that security be an integral, indispensable component of the peace process. Only then can we achieve real peace."

It was clear that Netanyahu's firm hand was reasonable and it began to ring a note of confidence with the man in the street. Perhaps now some of the world leaders, who are connected in some way with the peace process, can really see and appreciate that there are two sides to a peace agreement and that Israel also has a point of view.

Netanyahu does seem to have a blind spot as far as the economy is concerned. His credo, " I think we are doing all the right things with the economy," is not shared by the captains of industry. As prime minister, he has to show that he has a handle on the economy. It seems that he is not a realist and he would be well advised to listen to those with more business experience, in order to bring down unemployment and interest rates and revive Israel's export industries.

The liberalization of foreign currency regulations may be a jubilee gift with a sting in the tail. Not only has the liberalization been amended and re-amended even before its implementation, but the scope of the freedom offered to Israelis to invest abroad and buy property may once again destabilize the shekel and make the rich richer and the poor, poorer. If Netanyahu really wants to close the social gap, this is not the way to do it. At least, not now.

The prime minister also discussed the subject of Jewish unity, with special reference to the Diaspora. "The bond between Israel and the Diaspora is vital to our survival. It is what gives the Jewish people strength in the present, and confidence in the future.

"Ever since the struggling days of the state's beginning, unity has been our invaluable weapon. And whenever cracks seem to appear in this bond, we prove time and again that in times of trouble or when facing a national challenge we set aside our differences and act as one people."

Arafat, who met with Gore in the West Bank town of Ramallah early Sunday morning, has accepted the U.S. proposal, but wants an additional redeployment by the end of this year.

Israel maintains that the proposal would be harmful to its security interests. It has offered nine percent, and balks at offering an additional redeployment, saying any further transfer of West Bank territory should only take place as part of the final-status negotiations.

Some western and Arab diplomats say Israeli officials have told them privately they might hand over as much as 11 percent.

Palestinian officials, who have been warning for months that the region could explode into violence, are now reiterating their impatience with what they view as Israel's intransigence.

Arafat told journalists in the Gaza Strip on Sunday that Israel would be squarely to blame if no progress was achieved in London.

The talks' success will "depend on Netanyahu's actions because the problem does not lie anywhere else," he said.

Palestinian negotiator Nabil Sha'ath charged that Israel's wrangling over the redeployment percentages proved that the Jewish state was refusing to accept already-signed accords.

"They are dragging their feet and hoping that the whole process will change," he said. "If it changes, it will be for the worse, not the better."

But, in the run-up to the London talks, Israel showed no signs of changing its stance.

On Sunday, Netanyahu spokesman David Bar-Illan reiterated the Israeli position, saying it would be "utterly impossible" for Israel to accept a 13 percent redeployment.

New crisis brewing?

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Two months after United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan averted a war in the Middle East, Iraq is chafing at the bit again. It is demanding an immediate end to economic sanctions and trying to whittle down the UN arms inspection system.

Last week, as Iraq's president, Saddam Hussein, celebrated his 61st birthday, the Iraqi government issued a demand and levelled an accusation.

Tariq Aziz, Iraq's deputy prime minister and Saddam's spokesman, called on the Security Council to unconditionally lift sanctions that have been in place since Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

In addition, Aziz accused the UN's chief arms inspector, the Australian diplomat Richard Butler, of waging a vendetta against Iraq and of spying for the United States. Washington, which still maintains an armada in the Persian Gulf capable of striking Iraq, has spearheaded the seven-year campaign to eliminate Iraq's long-range missiles and its deadly arsenal of biological, chemical and nuclear arms.

Iraq's pleas, however, fell on deaf ears. Despite Russian, Chinese and French sympathy for Baghdad's position, the Security Council decided to prolong the sanctions, which have crippled Iraq's economy.

"...there will be no lifting of sanctions because Iraq has failed to comply with the relevant Security Council resolutions," announced Bill Richardson, the U.S. ambassador to the UN.

By the terms of the resolutions, Iraq is obliged to destroy its weapons of mass destruction. According to a report issued by Butler on April 16, Iraq has in fact failed the test. By Butler's reckoning, UN monitors working in Iraq over the past six months have not been able to verify Iraq's claim that it has gotten rid of its prohibited weapons.

Iraq's foreign minister, Mohammed Said-al Sahhaf, told the Security Council last week that these weapons were demolished in 1991, the year the Gulf War – the "mother of all battles" – ended. He added that the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM), the body charged with dismantling Iraq's illegal armory, was disseminating propaganda and lies.

But within an hour of Sahhaf's disingenuous declaration, Butler presented the Security Council with dramatic evidence that UNSCOM had recently discovered active mustard gas in artillery shells found at an Iraqi ammunition depot in 1996.

That, he asserted, had raised concerns about some 600 similar shells still unaccounted for in Iraq.

It's clear that Iraq is still playing a cat-and-mouse game with the UN. But to be completely fair, Iraq has not been entirely delinquent.

The Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency claims that Iraq has successfully delivered a "full, final and complete" account of its past nuclear weapons programs. During the 1970s and 1980s, Iraq tried to build a nuclear bomb, but apparently ceased such efforts with the outbreak of the Gulf War.

In last week's Security Council debate over sanctions, China demanded that "the nuclear file be closed." Washington, while acknowledging a measure of progress in this area, described China's proposal as "premature," and urged the UN to reconsider the matter when UNSCOM releases its next report in October.

Iraq has also improved its record with respect to allowing UN inspectors access to so-called sensitive sites. The original crisis began last autumn when Iraq refused to cooperate with UNSCOM. But with the United States and its allies threatening to bomb Iraq back into compliance, Saddam finally relented. In March, UN monitors, accompanied by senior foreign diplomats, inspected eight previously out of bounds presidential palaces believed to contain materiel related to banned weapons programs.

That they found nothing of an incriminating nature was hardly surprising. Having expected the visits, Iraq "cleaned" the sites.

The question now is whether Saddam Hussein will honor his agreement with Annan to permit an unlimited number of inspections over an indefinite period of time. If he does not, a new crisis will erupt.

Neo-Nazi activities explored

By SERGIO KIERNAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Security officials in Uruguay are investigating a surge of neo-Nazi activities in the capital of Montevideo.

In the most recent incident, flyers bearing a portrait of Adolf Hitler were put up on walls throughout the capital's downtown area.

Earlier this year, a Jewish-owned store was destroyed by Molotov cocktails. When firemen arrived at the scene, they found a large swastika painted over the store's entrance.

Last year, vandals burned down the Holocaust memorial in a park near the presidential residence in the capital.

Saul Gilvich, president of the Israelite Central Committee of Uruguay, believes that the increase in neo-Nazi activity in his country is linked to the surge of similar activity in neighboring Argentina.

"Every time there is trouble over there, we suffer here," he said.

Some 32,500 Jews live in Uruguay, and roughly 250,000 Jews live in Argentina.

April 27

• Five Israeli soldiers were wounded, one seriously, when Hezbollah members detonated a roadside bomb in the security zone of south Lebanon. In a separate skirmish with Hezbollah, an officer was wounded by mortar fire.

• A one-minute siren and official ceremony at the Western Wall Plaza in Jerusalem signaled the start of Yom Hazikaron, in memory of the 18,748 Israelis who have died defending Israel, and in honor of the 77,126 who have been disabled through combat.

April 29

• Media reports speculated that Zalaman Shoval would soon replace Eliyahu Ben-Elissar as ambassador to the United States. Ben-Elissar would be named ambassador in Paris.

April 30

• Most Israelis celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut.

May 1

• Media were full of reports of the withdrawal by the Batsheva dance troupe from the jubilee celebrations, due to what they described as "religious coercion" by the haredi establishment which had threatened to bring down the government.

50 Years Ago

JERUSALEM, May 2 — The Haganah announced today that attacks by some 8,000 invading Syrian, Lebanese and Iraqi troops on five Jewish settlements on the northeastern border facing Syria were repulsed yesterday, while the British revealed that they were rushing troops, tanks and heavy guns from Malta and Cyprus to Palestine because of the rapidly "deteriorating situation," which they said had resulted in the Irgun's attack on Jaffa.

A Jewish Agency spokesman commented sharply on the British attitude, asserting that "the situation has only deteriorated in that Jews have been scoring military successes."

Canadian students join March of Living experience

By NAOMI HARRIS
Special to The CJN

I am a 24-year-old student who travelled as a photographer with the Coast-to-Coast contingent of the recent March of the Living.

The group was made up of about 120 participants from communities outside Toronto and Montreal, including Vancouver, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, London, Hamilton, Ottawa, Kingston and Halifax.

We arrived in Poland on April 20. In an attempt to show us the rich quality of life that existed in Poland before the war, visits were made to the Gensha (Jewish) cemetery in Warsaw, the Jewish Quarter in Krakow and the shtetl of Tychochin.

The death camps of Auschwitz-Birkenau, Majdanek, and Treblinka told the story of how six million Jews died at the hand of the Nazis.

At the end of each day, students broke up into groups for debriefing sessions where they were able to express their emotions, listen to others' feelings and offer support to one another.

On Yom Hashoah, over 6,000 Jewish students and survivors from around the world marched with Polish supporters from Auschwitz to Birkenau. This three-kilometre stretch of broken road was transformed into a sea of blue jackets with Israeli flags dancing like sailboats upon it.

However, the closing ceremony at Birkenau was a disappointment. Most of the ceremony was conducted in Hebrew, leaving many of us unable to understand the proceedings. Furthermore, the presence of Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his security staff created a sense of exclusion among the participants. Finally, survivors and students were virtually excluded from meaningful participation in the ceremony. Barry Rishikof, March of the Living's Canadian chair, said the general feeling was that the Yom Hashoah ceremony was not the place for political statements.

A most unexpected aspect of the trip was the participation of the non-Jewish group, the Polish Friends of Israel, who showed support by taking part in the march. This group is growing in number year after year.

Further strides towards reconciliation were made with a first-time program where the Jewish students of the Coast-to-Coast contingent met with non-Jewish Polish students from a local Warsaw high school. After lunch on Shabbat, these students asked each other about their schools, their recreation activities and their thoughts on the Holocaust and anti-Semitism. The discussion was honest and passionate, with both sides openly willing to acknowledge the difficulties of the past.

In another departure from previous marches, 11 Israeli students from Or Yehuda, a small development town near Tel Aviv, accompanied the Coast-to-Coast group throughout their travels in Poland and Israel. This pilot project is aimed at creating close friendships between Israeli and Canadian students of the same group in an educational framework.

Our group was fortunate to travel with Jury Cohen, an Auschwitz-Birkenau survivor from Toronto. On Oct. 7, 1994, Cohen's life was saved by the courageous actions of four women and the members of the Sonderkommando. These women, Ala Gertner, Roza Robata, Regina Safirstain and Estera Wajcblum smuggled explosives in their clothing from the factory where they worked. The Sonderkommando then used the explosives to blow up Crematorium IV in Birkenau, killing five SS guards. Cohen and others, who had already stripped for the "showers" were released.

As I write this, we are on our way back from Treblinka. Tonight we leave for Israel. Treblinka is an isolated green pasture surrounded by deep forests. The wind whistles across the landscape. There are 17,000 stones, each symbolizing a Polish community of 150 or more Jews destroyed during the Holocaust. On one stone is marked Radomsk, the town from which my grandmother's family originated.

As I lit a Yizkor candle to commemorate the memory of my family and all those who perished during the Holocaust, I thought of my grandmother who immigrated to Canada in 1928 and never had a chance to say goodbye.

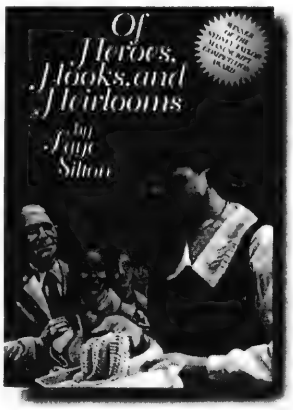
'Of Heroes, Hooks, and Heirlooms'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



Most kids enjoy bringing family mementoes to class and talking about what those things mean to them.

That is the dilemma facing Mia, in the book, Of Heroes, Hooks, and Heirlooms by Faye Silton (The Jewish Publication Society), when her teacher asks the students to research their family histories and bring in pictures and crafts.

Mia is the daughter of Holocaust survivors who had lost everyone and everything in World War II. Her mother only has one picture of her family, a very stiff and formal portrait.

Mia has always felt rather embarrassed by her home, which is very starkly and simply decorated. Her parents insist that "it's better maybe not to shine too much, not to wear red, not to be the best."

She finds to her pleasure, however, that when her classmates visit, they are impressed by the simplicity of her home and the warmth and artistic sense of her mother.

Over the course of the book, she also learns to appreciate the dignity of those lost in the Holocaust, and the courage of the survivors.

Mia learns to crochet very skilfully, and finds out that she has inherited that skill from her grandmother.

She worries about how the class will react to the lace collar she crochets for her presentation. Can she make everyone understand that what she inherited from Mutti (her grandmother) was real, that the lace collar stood for her dignity and faith in the face of terror, her special brand of pride.

Her class also learns to appreciate the heirlooms of the other students – from a native American dreamcatcher, to a quilt used on the cold Nebraska prairie, to Russian music.

And they also discover the common threads of struggle and accomplishment.

STRUB'S Pickle Corner STRUB'S

Vol. 1, No. 2 • May 7, 1998

Hello! How are ya? I hope you had a wonderful Pesach. Wasn't the Beet Horseradish great this year? It cleared up my friend's cold on the first bite! Thanks to all of you who took the time to write me. I had quite a variety of questions, from the price of pickles during Pesach to where Strub's pickles can be purchased in Florida. Keep the e-mail, letters and pictures coming!

Question of the Month

Dear Pickle Guy:

My family and friends have loved Strub's pickles for years – yum!!! Over the past 70 years, what products have your "Pickle People" produced that aren't currently being made in your product line-up? And more importantly, what new products are you testing for the future?

Also, does Pickle Guy have a girlfriend? Maybe I can fix him up! — Sincerely, B.W., Toronto

The Pickle Guy Replies

Dear B.W.:

I'm glad that you and your friends are such great Strub's fans, but I'm afraid that I'm a "taken" Pickle Guy. I've been happily fermenting with the same Pickle Gal for quite some time now and really enjoy the bottled lifestyle.

The product development team at Strub's is always coming up with new food ideas. Not all of them make it to your store shelves, but we do test many recipes and ideas each year. Our latest additions include Marinated Mushrooms, Bean Salad, Deli Mix Olives and Sandwich Snacker Pickles. If you can't find them at your favourite store, ask the manager to get them for you. He'll probably call me soon after.

In our seventy years of pickling, we have not deleted an item from our product offering, except for Tzatziki, which was available for a short time between 1991 and 1993. Thanks again for your letter. I'll be sending you one of my "Pickle Guy" T-Shirts and Hats.

Remember, send your letters, pictures, and postcards to me:

Pickle Guy
c/o Strub's Pickle Corner

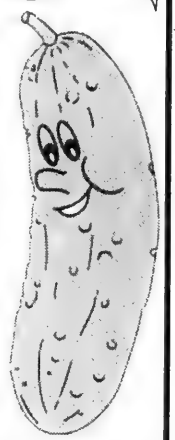
BRANTFORD, ON N3R 7K2
e-mail: STRUBPICKL@AOL.COM

I answer ALL my mail, and if I use your letter in "Pickle Corner", I'll send you one of my "Pickle Guy" T-shirts and Hats. Thanks, and talk to you next month in the June 4 issue of the CJN.



Got a question? Write to me, the Pickle Guy — I answer ALL my mail!

Sensitive film captures Israel's deep political strife

In this article Bill Gladstone reviews three of the many films that will be shown during the sixth annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival, May 7 to 14 at the Bloor Street Cinema, Toronto. For tickets, phone 416-324-8600.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Israeli Daniel Katzir, 24, grew up under the shadow of violence: his grandfather was killed in a terrorist attack at Lod Airport in the 1970s. As a soldier in the Israel Defense Forces, he had a second initiation into violence during the intifadah.

Like most young people, Katzir is searching for love, but what makes his quest different is that he decides to chronicle it on film. The result is Out For Love...Be Back Shortly, an engaging and sensitive 55-minute documentary that captures both Katzir's personal romantic hunt and the deep political strife that beset the Jewish nation in the days leading up to the Rabin assassination.

In a society where terrorist bombs explode with alarming frequency, Katzir can't express his love for his girlfriend, Iris, who is about to be initiated into the army. As ordinary people are blown apart all around him, Katzir seems afraid to love. At times, he even seems to hide behind the camera rather than be drawn emotionally into a fractious, brutal world.

The film begs the question, can love bloom, unencumbered and uninhibited, in a society that is in a psychological state of war?

Out For Love...Be Back Shortly does not resolve the questions it raises, but it stands as one artist's personal statement of deep alienation from Israeli society. The filmmaker managed to capture some extraordinary footage of political demonstrations and of his grandmother as she reveals the heartbreaking story of her tragic loss.

Katzir's girlfriend, Iris Arie, is expected to attend the screening May 10 at 7:30 p.m., as well as the student-program screening, May 12 at 12:30 p.m.

Like many young-to-middle-age American and Canadian Jews, filmmaker Alan Berliner was bitten by the genealogical bug. His award-winning 1996 film, Nobody's Business, is an attempt, not only to document some of his family's history, but also to explore the relationships within his own nuclear family, especially between himself and his father Oscar.

The elder Berliner sees no point whatsoever in family tree research; he's of the generation that needed to distance itself from its immigrant past. The hour-long film is a fast-paced, witty progression of discoveries and dialogues, with the son pushing for answers about the past and the father professing indifference, even antipathy, to recovering lost family links and secrets. A lonely and feisty old man, the filmmaker's father stubbornly insists that the sleeping poodles of the past should not be disturbed.

Berliner also explores the relationship between his mother and father, which may be compared to an ever-widening chasm that finally became too large to bridge. In one brilliant, gut-wrenching scene, a house is shown falling over a cliff into the sea, symbolizing the couple's painful divorce.

This powerful metaphor highlights the eternal significance of family relationships in our lives. Must viewing for anyone with an interest in family history, Berliner's riveting documentary is scheduled for May 14 at 5:30 p.m.

Ever since the Chinese conquered Tibet, forcing the Dalai Lama and many loyal Tibetan nationalists to flee, the spiritual leader of the Tibetan people has been seeking ways to preserve and unite his people in exile.

It seems natural, therefore, that the Dalai Lama should approach a contingent of Jews to find out how the Jewish people have survived in exile for 2,000 years.

Author Rodger Kamenetz joined a 1990 Jewish mission to meet the Tibetan holy man in Dharmsala, India, at a point when his own spirits were at a low ebb. He and his wife had lost a son shortly after childbirth, and he had then written a book that his publisher had outrightly rejected. This dialogue between two ancient cultures was somehow the key to rejuvenating Kamenetz.

He returned home and wrote The Jew In The Lotus, which became a bestseller.

Also titled The Jew In The Lotus, this 57-minute documentary by American director Laurel Chiten captures the exotic, impoverished flavor of India, as well as the feelings of the Jewish Americans that they had landed on another planet.

The film's interplay of Judaism and Buddhism was bound to generate some interesting philosophical discussions, but to my mind, the film presents these in a superficial manner. The Jew In The Lotus really tells the tale of John Kamenetz's media success; the film acknowledges his limited knowledge of Buddhism. Viewers are left wishing for deeper insights into both religions.

The Jew In The Lotus airs May 14, 7 p.m. with the director in attendance.

TICKET SALES UP FOR JEWISH FILM FEST

One week before the May 7 opening of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival's (TJFF) sixth season, Shlomo Schwartzberg, its director of programming, reports that ticket sales "are running almost 50 percent above last year at this time. People are saying it's our most diverse program yet."

However, tickets to all screenings are still available as of this writing. While the festival has come very close to selling out its allotment of 350 festival passes, there are still some passes available.

According to Schwartzberg, a short film about the TJFF has been included as one of several last-minute additions to the program. Made by Ryerson film student Chris Trebilcock, Beyond Bathurst: The Making of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival features interviews with Schwartzberg, TJFF producer Helen Zukerman and Debra Kwinter, TJFF's director of development.

It is scheduled for May 10 at 7:30 p.m., as a prelude to the wonderful Israeli flick Out For Love... Be Back Shortly.

Another short film added to the program is Sara – The Diary of the Free World, which was supposed to be part of last year's fest but never arrived. It's a 14-minute Romanian-made impressionistic documentary about a movie projectionist's fantasies related to events in the Holocaust. Watch for it May 13 at 3 p.m. as a prelude to Poland: Creating a New Jewish Heritage.

As another last-minute development, the festival is bringing in Richard Trank, producer of The Long Way Home, the closing film on May 14 at 9 pm. Although this time slot corresponds with the last episode of Seinfeld, fans of the popular TV show are advised to videotape it so as not to miss this astonishing Academy Award-winning documentary, which features extremely rare footage of Jewish refugees on the arduous journey from postwar Europe to Palestine. For tickets, call 324-8600.

Humor As Tonic: The La'Briyut Wellness Department of the Bernard Betel Centre presents the second annual Brenda Zalken Memorial Lectures, focusing on Humor as the Best Medicine. Dr. David Saul, family physician, speaks on May 11, 1:15 p.m., and actor-author Howard Jerome is featured on May 21, 1:15 p.m. Free. 1003 Steeles Ave. W. 225-2112 (Joan).

* * *

Therapeutic Art: Shedding Skins: Dream Art and Text is an exhibition of paintings by Susan Schellenberg that chronicle the slow healing process and recovery from a mental illness diagnosed as schizophrenia. Dreamlike and evocative, Schellenberg's paintings probe the meaning and dimensions of madness. On view in the Galleria of BCE Place, 181 Bay St., May 4 to 8.

Arts Briefs:

• Reflections, an exhibition of photographs by Martin Kellerstein, is on view at Gallery Gabor, 587 Markham St., Toronto, to June 4. 534-1839.

• The Steve Lawrence and Eydie Gorme concert previously scheduled for May 14 and 15 at the Hummingbird Centre has been cancelled.

• Juten Gallery (1236 Kingston Rd., Toronto) presents Form and Fantasy, featuring works by Canadian sculptor Ruben Zellermayer, which are "characterized by a whimsical play on the anatomical form employing mixed metals and hammered bronze." Opens May 7, 7 to 9 p.m., and continues to May 28. 691-4999.

In the Spotlight: Since he came to Canada in 1941, Walter Homburger has been involved in the Canadian performing arts scene in many roles. After completing his service in the Canadian Army, he established the International Artists Concert Agency through which he brought great artists to perform in Toronto. The roster has included Artur Rubinstein, Vladimir Horowitz, Charles Laughton, Marian Anderson, Itzhak Perlman, Luciano Pavarotti, Victor Borge, Louis Armstrong and Sir John Gielgud.

Homburger was the artistic manager for Glenn Gould and helped to shape the careers of other outstanding artists such as Victor Braun, Jan Rubes and Louis Lortie. He was the first manager of the National Ballet of Canada and managing director of the Toronto Symphony for 25 years.

He is currently manager of renowned Canadian violinist James Ehnes, who is one of six featured Canadian artists on the line-up for a May 24 concert presented by the Women's Musical Club of Toronto at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, North York. Homburger is a patron of the Women's Musical Club of Toronto, which celebrates its centennial this year.

Other artists to perform in the May 24 concert are Russell Braun, Angela Hewitt, Stephen Ralls, Catherine Robbin and Michael Schade. Tickets are $75, $50 and $25. 923-7052.

Still Running: Wendy Wasserstein's The Sisters Rosensweig is playing at the Alumnae Theatre until May 9. 70 Berkeley St. 364-4170.

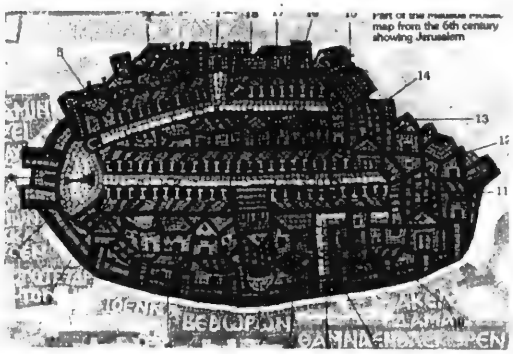
TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE



Part of the Madaba Mosaic map from the 6th century.

SIXTH CENTURY MAP OF JERUSALEM ON VIEW IN JORDANIAN TOWN

A tile mosaic on a church floor in the Jordanian town of Madaba, about 32 kilometres south of Amman, contains a remarkable treasure: the earliest known map of the Holy City of Jerusalem. Dating from the 6th century, the stylized oval-shaped map is prized by archeologists, historians and theologians because it shows churches, gates, streets and other landmarks clearly, thus providing an excellent indication of what Jerusalem looked like in the Byzantine era some 15 centuries ago.

The mosaic is made up of more than 700,000 ceramic tiles. It was probably laid down during the reign of the Emperor Justinian (527-565).

Running through the centre of the map are two straight rows of white and tan tiles, representing the Cardo, the main boulevard from the Roman period which is still the main street of Old Jerusalem.

At the "nine o'clock" position on the map is the Damascus Gate, known as St. Stephen's Gate in the 6th century. Beside the gate is a courtyard with a single column, which probably once supported the statue of an emperor, perhaps Hadrian. Although the column has long since disappeared, it is still remembered in the Arabic name of the gate, Bab el-Amud, or Gate of the Column.

Scholars have identified some 18 churches in the Madaba mosaic, including the complex of buildings known collectively as the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Other buildings and structures shown in the map include a monastery, a staircase that was recently excavated on the southern wall of the ancient Temple Mount, and a public bath.

Conspicuous by its absence is any sort of grand depiction of the Temple Mount, the site of the former Jewish Temple, which is indicated only by a line of black tiles.

The Romans had thoroughly destroyed the Temple in 73 AD and by the 6th century the platform upon which it had stood was a desolate ruin, possibly used as a garbage dump. It was more than a century before the rise of the Mohammedan religion, and nearly two centuries before the first Islamic building, a precursor of the Dome of the Rock, was erected on the Temple Mount.

The Madaba mosaic was uncovered in the late 19th century, after Ottoman officials permitted a group of Greek Orthodox Christians to build a new church on the ancient ruins of a cathedral. The builders were clearing away debris and rubble from the older building in 1884 when they uncovered the mosaic map, which they repaired and incorporated into the floor of the new building.

The mosaic is preserved in the Church of St. George. Except when religious services are in session, visitors may tour the church and view the map, which is roped off so as to prevent the public from walking on it. For those not planning a trip to Jordan, a large replica of the Madaba mosaic is on view along an arcaded section of the Cardo in Jerusalem.

A few miles from Madaba is another site which no one interested in Biblical history should miss. Offering an exquisite panoramic lookout of the Jordan Valley, Mount Nebo is the spot from which, according to tradition, Moses glimpsed the Promised Land before dying at the age of 120.

Moses never arrived in the Promised Land. Tradition asserts that G-d buried him in a secret location on Mount Nebo. Stretching into the distance, the desert vista is painted in pale shades of brown, mauve, turquoise and purple. Along the bottom of the valley a thin black line – actually the River Jordan – snakes through a pale patch of green. To the southwest, the mirrory Dead Sea lies like a vast pool of mercury on the desert floor.

On clear mornings, the towers and domes of Jerusalem are visible on the distant horizon. These days, one is also apt to see a gray industrial haze darkening the azure sky.

As in Madaba, some superb ancient mosaics are on view here, in the structure that the Franciscans constructed in the 1930s over some Byzantine-era ruins.

Five-part TV series focuses on Emil Fackenheim

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Emil Fackenheim, the German-born Canadian philosopher who now lives in Israel, is the subject of a five-part Vision TV series which starts on May 12 at 8:30 p.m.

Entitled Emil Fackenheim: A Spiritual Declaration, the series explores his early life in Halle, his engagement with Western philosophers from Plato to Heidegger, his ordination as a liberal rabbi in Berlin, his flight from Germany, his studies and career at the University of Toronto, his immigration to Israel and his reflections on the Holocaust and the Jewish state.

In the first episode, The Promised Land, Fackenheim acknowledges that he was once an anti-Zionist who considered Berlin as the "new Jerusalem" and German culture as the apotheosis of human expression.

As well, he extols Israel as "a unique celebration of life," characterizes Jerusalem as the capital of the Jewish people, tearily recalls seeing his first public sign in Hebrew, and describes the Arab-Israeli dispute as a "tragic conflict between right and right."

In the second segment, Exiled Survivor, Fackenheim, son of a successful lawyer, leaves Germany and escapes to Canada, where he finds his bearings and rises to prominence as an academic.

In the next three parts, The Dead Do Not Praise God, When Christianity Died and Faith in the Secular Age, he talks about being an accidental survivor, claims that churches were unfaithful to the tenets of Christianity during the Holocaust, and responds to the question of why God allowed it to happen.

Not surprisingly, Emil Fackenheim: A Spiritual Declaration is both stimulating and provocative. Judging by the opening episode, it is television that engages the mind and refrains from pandering to the lowest common denominator.

Israel's foreign correspondents

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts editor

It seems as though every day, televisions around the world show pictures from Israel – Palestinians wielding stones and Molotov cocktails and Israeli troops firing rubber bullets.

What is it about Israel that draws so much valuable air time and newspaper space? One of the reasons is that for such a tiny country there are so many journalists. In fact, there are as many foreign correspondents in Jerusalem as there are in Washington or Moscow.

Primetime War, airing on The Passionate Eye, CBC May 10, 8 p.m. ET, examines the lives of two cameramen working in Israel, Alon Bernstein, an Israeli who works as a freelancer for Associated Press and Jimmy Michael, a Palestinian who works for the BBC.

The two, obviously at opposite ends of the battle, work together and have become friends after covering one atrocity after another in the past year – intifadah-like uprisings in the West Bank and the suicide bombing in the Machane Yehuda market in Jerusalem.

Bernstein, perhaps because he is older, is more cynical about his profession. Face it, he says, "Israel is the most comfortable news gathering place on the planet. You can live a nice, comfortable life, then get in your car, drive a few miles and take pictures that people back home think is the end of the world. It is ridiculous but that's the way it is."

"In Israel you can live in the city and be near a war zone. The foreign press finds that very attractive," Bernstein says.

One powerful moment in this excellent documentary is the day of the tragic suicide bombing in Jerusalem. After the rush of filming the day's events and sending them off to their respective agencies, the two cameramen – both visibly shaken – get a moment to reflect on the day's events.

"People have a right to feel bad about us [journalists]," Bernstein says. "We deliver horrible things to them."

"At the same time," the younger Michael says, "people can learn something out of this."

"Like what? We've been taking horrible pictures for 50 years. What have people learned from it?"

"I disagree," Michael says trying to put this all in perspective, but perhaps he isn't as articulate as Bernstein. "It will make people see what's happening here."

"All people will learn," Bernstein says, "is when you plant a bomb, you go live on CNN."

Primetime War is worth watching. It shows us, through example, how much of the "news" as we see it is only news because cameramen were present. In one incident, bored journalists urge a Palestinian boy to bait Israeli troops by waving a flag in front of them. "This is clearly journalism gone wrong," one journalist says.

Business Profile

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Harold Green's name has been synonymous with construction for decades in Toronto. But Green has also demonstrated that he's something of a renaissance man in the building business.

He's been in the construction trade for 53 years, and has lent his name to dozens of single-family, highrise-condo, commercial and industrial projects.

But unlike some builders who have clashed with trade unions in their efforts to get projects built, Green has also worked the labor side of things, and his efforts have led to lasting peace among the trades, as well as more equitable working conditions.

He helped pioneer the building of pre-fabricated structures in Toronto, had a hand in the construction and selling of homes in Canada's first fully planned community, and built Toronto Jewry's central address – the Lipa Green Building – bearing his late father's name.

He's also devised a number of innovations in construction techniques, both in materials and labor, which have speeded the building process and made it more cost-efficient.

It's been a long time coming, but this has been, and will be, a year of laurels for the master Toronto builder.

In February, Green was inducted into the Greater Toronto Home Builders Association Hall of Fame in recognition of his contributions to the city's construction industry and its labor unions.

A few days later, he was honored by Mount Sinai Hospital for his involvement on its executive and his supervision of more than 30 hospital projects, including the Marvelle Koffler Breast Cancer Clinic.

Finally, on June 2, Green, his wife Miriam, and 18 other couples in the city's Jewish community, will be awarded the Canada-Israel Children's Centres' Peace Prize for their support of social and recreational complexes in Israel, which benefit more than 200,000 Israeli kids a year.

Green, a man of few words who still puts in a full day's work at age 71, takes it all in stride. Surrounded by photographs of his many projects, his three sons and nine grandchildren (soon to be 10) at his company's headquarters, the Yonge-Eglinton Centre, he reminisces about his humble origins.

He learned bricklaying while still a teenager, following in the footsteps of his Polish-born father, who came to Canada in 1910. Green and his brothers Al, a carpenter, and Sam, also a bricklayer, started out by building some of Toronto's best-known Jewish bakeries, as well as factories in the city's garment district.

During World War II, Harold trained as a wireless air gunner for the Royal Canadian Air Force, and completed his course on May 8, 1945 – the very day the Allies declared victory in Europe. He never did see any action.

But three years later, his father, together with Toronto's Weinstock family, launched the Greenwin Construction Company, which provided plenty of action for the following 30 years.

Greenwin began modestly by building single-family homes and small plants. Harold started managing the company's construction division in 1952 – the same year he looked at the peaceful, rolling farm hills of Don Mills, and saw an opportunity.

The developer of the lands was having trouble getting homes built there. Many builders resisted the concept of the day, namely, that it was the developer who retained control over all aspects of the project, including the building of components of homes in off-site factories. The notion of subdivision control of almost every visible exterior component was new and strange to both purchasers and builders.

But Greenwin embraced it, and launched the now-standard method of mass producing prefabricating house components. For the first time, walls, windows, floors, roofs, trusses and stairs – all were manufactured at the plant and installed on site. The length of time it took to produce a home was reduced dramatically, and what Green calls Canada's first "master-planned" community was born.

He never looked back. Green estimates he built between 300 and 400 homes a year for the following 10 years in Don Mills.

The year 1961 was a watershed. "We did our first highrise that year," Green recalls, "at Eglinton and Winnett. It was 3½ storeys. That was a highrise in those days." Another was put up on Sherbourne Avenue, and soon, Greenwin-built highrise apartments and condo suites were dotting the Yonge-Davisville area.

A technique borrowed from European construction methods later yielded three of the world's tallest prefabricated concrete structures in the world, each averaging 26 storeys, and all in Toronto.

It was during this period that Green first noticed something was amiss in highrise construction methods. Large structures at the time were built using the "craft" system, meaning a building was put up by one specialized tradesman working after another, each completing only his craft. Carpenters would start and finish; to be followed by steel workers, then concrete pourers, and so on. The system was slow and laborious.

Harold Green

Greenwin, through negotiations with the powerful trade unions, devised a new tack: a multi-trained tradesman called a formworker, who could perform all tasks, one after the other, with no stoppages.

In addition, Greenwin also experimented with a new system of highrise construction called the "flying form," which allowed large chunks of a structure to be assembled and then hoisted onto the floor above.

The efficiency of the new systems represented a 30 percent improvement in overall building costs and timing.

But not all had been calm on the labor front.

"Traditionally, every April 30, there would be a strike," Green says. "You could count on it." Having assisted his father in helping to re-settle and train many post-war refugees, Green saw the need to deal fairly with construction workers. So in 1967, he founded and served as first president of the Metro Toronto Apartment Builders Association, which formed a link between the city's construction laborers and the high-rise builders.

The association forged the industry's first collective agreement between workers, employers and the union, and set up medical, dental, and legal aid plans, as well as pensions, for construction workers. Green himself spearheaded the committee that established a grievance mechanism, which is still in use today.

He also founded a fund to help rehabilitate injured construction workers, or to re-train them.

A peace pact with the unions was finally sealed in 1969. "And it's been quiet ever since," Green notes with just a hint of pride.

Green wrapped up the construction side of Greenwin in 1978. Today, he, his brother Al and Albert Latner are the principals behind Greenwin Properties, which owns or manages more than 45,000 rental apartments and townhomes, and oversees a portfolio of more than three million square feet of office space.

Twenty years ago, Green created Verdiroc Construction, which is building, or has built, over 2,000 condominium units. Some are luxurious (Highland Green in Aurora), but over half of them are government non-profit housing, including the Moshav Noam project at Bathurst and Lawrence. Verdiroc has also built over one million square feet of industrial, retail and health care projects.

Green is taciturn when it comes to his achievements. "It's a tough business," he allows, "but I wouldn't want to be anyplace else."

New procedure produces babies free of Tay-Sachs

By LESLIE KATZ
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

SAN FRANCISCO — Neil and Ann Wolff are both carriers of Tay-Sachs disease.

But with the help of a relatively new technique called pre-implantation genetic diagnosis, the Wolffs' 5-month-old daughter, Rachel, is free of the genetic disorder, which afflicts a disproportionate number of Ashkenazi Jews.

"The real beauty of this technology is that it holds the promise to completely eliminate this disease," says Ann Wolff.

When both members of a couple are carriers, there is a 25 percent chance of conceiving a child with Tay-Sachs, which attacks the central nervous system. Before Rachel's conception, the couple aborted two fetuses shown by amniocentesis to have the disease.

"We were very much at the end of our rope," says Ann Wolff, 38. "We were overwhelmed with the loss and grief and disappointment. We were really ready to give up on having children."

Instead, they turned to the genetic diagnosis, a procedure they had unsuccessfully tried after their first abortion. Performed at only a handful of clinics around the country, the procedure involves developing embryos outside the mother's body and screening them for certain genetic diseases before implanting them in the uterus.

Last year, at the Jones Institute for Reproductive Medicine in Norfolk, Va., doctors put Wolff on fertility drugs to stimulate egg production. After extracting four eggs and fertilizing them with her husband's sperm, they waited until each of the embryos included eight cells.

They then took a single cell from each embryo and used the latest technology to analyse the DNA and determine which embryos were free of Tay-Sachs.

Genetic technique

As it turns out, all four developing embryos were found to be free of the disease – two were carriers. To increase Wolff's chances of becoming pregnant, all four embryos were implanted in her womb.

According to Susan Gitlin, a specialist in pre-implantation genetic diagnosis, women undergoing the procedure typically have more than one embryo implanted. Gitlin, who is an instructor of obstetrics and gynecology at Eastern Virginia Medical School, says the chances of a multiple birth are 10 to 15 percent.

The Wolffs, who live in Mountain View, Calif., were willing to take the risk.

"After all the losses, twins would have been a blessing for us," Ann Wolff says. In the end, only one embryo thrived. Rachel was born on Nov. 5, 1997.

There is no treatment or cure for Tay-Sachs, named after two doctors who identified the syndrome in the late 19th century. Most victims of the disease, which destroys the brain and causes the body to shut down, die by age five.

While a large percentage of carriers are Ashkenazi Jews, other groups with high numbers of carriers include Cajuns and French Canadians. Sephardi Jews carry the gene at about the same rate as the general population – one in 200.

Pre-implantation genetic diagnosis takes about two weeks and costs approximately $10,000. Brittany Nicole Abshire of Louisiana, the world's first Tay-Sachs-free baby born using the procedure, is now nearly 4 years old.

A couple in which both partners are carriers has a number of other options when it comes to having children. They can adopt. The woman can be artificially inseminated. They can, as the Wolffs did, have their pregnancy monitored by amniocentesis and abort if the fetus is found to be affected.

Many couples choose the latter method, as it is cheaper and less elaborate than pre-implantation genetic diagnosis. But some abortion opponents oppose it, since affected embryos are discarded.

Neil Wolff, 39, first learned he was a Tay-Sachs carrier at age 15. Years later, while a law student, he had his blood tested again, hoping for a different result. "I had not liked the answer," he says.

She, on the other hand, had never been tested for the disease. "It was not something I thought about," she says. "I didn't know anyone who was a Tay-Sachs carrier. It was never an issue."

She refused to get tested until after the couple became engaged in early 1994. "She didn't want the answer to the question to affect our decision about whether or not we loved each other and wanted to spend our life together," Neil Wolff says.

A week after their engagement came the bad news: She, too, was a carrier of the fatal disorder.

The news shocked them both – and spurred Ann's family members to get tested. "We found out my father was a carrier, and two of my siblings were carriers," she says.

The couple plans to have another child as soon as possible. "We will make up our minds over the next couple of months whether we will go back to the Jones Institute or roll the dice again," Neil Wolff says.

But while the notion of rolling the dice and possibly having to terminate another pregnancy once seemed too painful to bear, it now strikes them as tolerable.

In any event, her father says, referring to Rachel, "We've got something to hold onto."

School principal is weightlifting official by night

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Karen Cohen would like to set the record straight.

Not at all. In fact, the average Ontario weightlifter is not too distinguishable from the guy or gal next door, with better tone and bigger thighs. Most of their strength comes from their legs and they're able to lift enormous quantities of weight because of their technical skills, she says.

Cohen knows of what she speaks. The principal of Park Lane School by day, by night (and on weekends) Cohen is a member of the Ontario Weightlifting Association (OWA) and serves as "a Canadian level official. I officiate at local competitions, provincial level competitions and at the Canadian level too," she said.

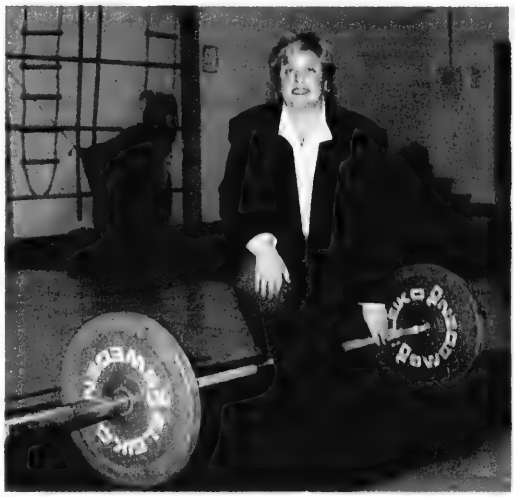
As an official at weekly weightlifting competitions, Cohen has many tasks. If she's serving as a technical controller, it's her job to get the athletes lined up for presentation, supervise the warm-up room, check that the equipment and platform are in good order and make sure that none of the competitors is wearing jewelry or has lubricated their legs.

If she's actually judging a competition, her tasks get more complicated. She has to make sure the lifts are all done according to the rules – and there's a 166-page rulebook to rely on.

The judges must watch the lifters to make sure their knee does not touch the floor during a lift; make sure they don't take more than a minute once they've lifted the bar above their knees; ensure they lift the weight in one continuous motion; and be sure they don't have bent elbows when the weight is above their heads, she said.

For an apparently simple sport, there's a lot of technical aspects to it. "To be successful," Cohen says, "the athletes have to work extremely hard. They have to have a combination of strength, speed and flexibility and really good coaching with respect to technique."

Though you're not likely to see much weightlifting on television or in the press outside of the Olympics and major international events, it's a sport with a broad grassroots support in Canada, Cohen said.



Weightlifting official Karen Cohen

Cohen's involvement in the sport goes back about five years to the days she was working out at the downtown YMCA. At the time, she was using free weights and Nautilus machines – and so were a bunch of OWA lifters. She became friends with some of them and eventually was asked by one to drive some athletes and officials to an event in Ingersoll.

Cohen agreed and when she saw the competition, she was intrigued.

"I went, I started watching and I was fascinated, particularly by the human dynamic. Everyone was so enthusiastic and supportive of each other, really urging other lifters on," she said.

After serving as a chauffeur on a few occasions, "I got tired of sitting there. I said I wanted to get more involved."

Her friends among OWA officials invited her to join in an apprenticeship program where she studied the sport's rules and learned the ropes. After taking a written test as well as a practical demonstration of her knowledge, she became an official.

Cohen points out that Jews have been involved with weightlifting for decades. A founding member of the OWA and its first president in 1968 was William Gryfe, who trained at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. The father-son team of Maurice and Joel Strauss trained at the Bloor branch of the Jewish Community Centre and Joel represented Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Morty Stolzman, an Orthodox Jew and a super heavyweight, was known in weightlifting circles for arriving at hotels for weekend competitions before sundown on Friday. Because competition in his weight class was held last on Saturday (weights are added to the bar throughout the competition), the Sabbath was over by the time he had to lift, Cohen said.

Besides meeting interesting people and learning the lore of the sport, Cohen's been busy officiating at weekend matches in venues such as St. Catharines, Orillia, Sarnia and Elliott Lake. She also officiated at the Ontario Winter Games and the Canadian Junior Championships in Winnipeg. With more experience, she hopes one day to officiate at international events like the Commonwealth Games and the Olympics.

So how do Canadian lifters measure up at international meets?

The Inside Back

Jews and drugs

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

In a nondescript office in a nondescript building in the Finch-Dufferin area, Jews addicted to hard drugs gather twice a week for group therapy led by a psychologist who is also an Orthodox rabbi.

The above sentence may have jarred some readers. Jewish drug addicts? Being counselled by an Orthodox rabbi?

Here's another zinger: The rabbi's wife, who wears a sheitl and modest knee-length dress, once had a $1,500-a-day heroin and cocaine habit.

Dr. Mordechai Blumenfeld, a PhD in psychology, is a graduate of Ner Israel Yeshiva, north of Toronto. At 54, he sports a medium-length, graying beard, glasses and a black velvet kippah – the standard "uniform." He is a soft-spoken, gentle father of seven. So it naturally checks the ear when he talks about mainlining heroin, smoking crack and popping codeine.

"I speak the lingo," he says.

Blumenfeld has a private practice, in which he specializes in family and marriage counselling. But the bulk of his time is taken up by the over 100 people who attend his clinic, the Alness Treatment Centre, set up about five years ago. He estimates that fully one-third of his patients are Jewish. Many are from Israeli and Russian immigrant families, but some are products of Canadian Jewish homes.

They're addicted to Tylenol, Percocet, morphine, but most are hooked on heroin via needles. The mean age is 30.

"By the time they get here, they're desperate," says Blumenfeld. "They've lost spouses, children and businesses. They've stolen and lied. They used to get high just to get high. Now, they're getting high to avoid getting sick."

The centre's two medical doctors, Michael Kirzner and Sheldon Hershkop, prescribe methadone, a synthetic opiate substitute that satisfies the craving without inducing the "high." After a week or two of that, it's on to two years of twice-weekly group therapy.

Blumenfeld has borrowed somewhat from Avraham Twerski, the chassidic American rabbi and psychiatrist who runs an addiction clinic in Pittsburgh. "Our philosophy is that addicts have lost respect for others and themselves. It's a question of self-esteem. They don't want to do drugs. By the time they get here, they've hit rock bottom."

Blumenfeld's approach combines rebuilding self-esteem along with healthy doses of spirituality. "Here, they get a sense of respect and worth," he says. He points out that seven of the traditional 12 steps toward recovery from addiction have spiritual components.

He remains diplomatic to a fault; even when asked how the Jewish community – traditionally very skittish when it comes to confronting social unpleasantness – has handled the problem. "There's a discomfort with it," he understates. "Rabbis have hidden the problem."

She openly admits that she did everything short of selling herself in order to fund an addiction to barbiturates, LSD, cocaine and heroin, before finally getting help from Chabad-Lubavitch. That was after she contacted several local pulpit rabbis. "The denial from them was atrocious," she says. "They still don't know, or deny, what we're dealing with. Jewish children are dying! My husband and I already buried two Jewish kids from this clinic."

A religious woman, she refrained from shooting up on Shabbat. She was finally cured at a Chabad-run centre in Los Angeles, and has been "clean" for eight years. (She married Blumenfeld five years ago). The Toronto clinic, she says, was her idea because she felt that Jewish addicts should be treated in a Jewish environment.

While most addicts come from broken or dysfunctional homes, according to Blumenfeld, "Ben" (not his real name) grew up in what he calls a "model" Jewish household. Now 40, he, like many of his peers, began smoking pot and hashish in high school. By his 30s, he was addicted to heroin. "My life was a wreck," he recalls.

He's been clean for five years. His marriage survived the terrible strain, and his business has recovered. "This place saved my life," he says.

But, he adds, "A lot of people would be shocked to know how much drug use there is the Jewish community. Nobody's immune."

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am a 52-year-old man. My mother, 75, was always an alert, very business-minded woman. She managed the pharmacy that she and my father owned together. He always depended upon her for any decision-making. After his sudden death eight years ago, she continued on her own in the pharmacy.

Suddenly, she is having severe memory lapses, dizziness, depression and some incontinence. I am desperate, as I have no siblings or wife to help me deal with this terrible problem.

Please help me!

Dear Please help me,

Sudden changes in physical and psychological condition are indicators that point to the need for a rapid assessment by your mother's family physician or geriatric assessment clinic. There are many factors that can be contributing to these sudden changes. The sooner she is seen and assessed by a physician, the quicker a treatment plan will begin.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Washington summit still a go

Last minute compromise staves off crisis

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat are expected to meet in Washington within the next two to three weeks, after Netanyahu and U.S. Middle East peace envoy Dennis Ross worked out a yet-to-be-detailed compromise on the IDF's next pullback in the West Bank.

A firm date has not yet been set, but the high-level conclave will be under the aegis of U.S. President Bill Clinton.

Neither Israeli nor American officials would specify the precise terms, but they were widely believed to involve an initial IDF evacuation of nine percent of the area in question by mid-summer and up to an additional four percent of territory to be designated for transfer to PA civilian control at a later date.

"The sense is that things should be worked out in a few weeks," a senior Israeli official said.

Bilateral efforts to iron out the remaining differences will be pursued while Netanyahu is in the United States.

The senior Israeli official said "the pending issues need refinement and further elaboration." He said the Ross mission resulted in "all sides" working toward a successful conclusion, but the last hurdle to be overcome for the summit to take place is the requisite understanding of Israel's position and the concomitant approval by the cabinet of the pullback terms.

Netanyahu spokesperson Shai Bazak issued a statement saying that Netanyahu will "meet

Halifax gets eruv

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — The Halifax Orthodox Jewish community finally has an eruv – and an enhanced capability for strict Shabbat observance.

"We were concerned we should have a viable Jewish community," said committee chairman Dr. Barrie Ross, a retired dermatologist who worked closely with Rabbi Saul Aronov, some community engineers and officials from the municipal government, the power company, the Halifax Bridge Commission, the Halifax Harbormaster and the federal coast guard to implement the eruv.

The idea was presented four years ago by Rabbi Shlomo Grafstein. Rabbi Aronov was asked to revisit the plan when he arrived 18 months ago. By last summer, the committee started work with the appropriate officials.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Kanee Receives Medal

WINNIPEG — Sal Kanee, honorary president of the 25th National Plenary Assembly of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), will be presented with the Nahum Goldmann Medal at the plenary, to be held May 24 and 25. Among his activities, Kanee served as national president of CJC from 1971 to 1974 and is a member of the board of governors.

Also at the plenary, former Canadian ambassador to Cuba, Mark Entwistle will receive the Saul Hayes Human Rights Awards.

Extradition Laws

TORONTO — Justice Minister Anne McLellan last week tabled legislation that would modernize Canada's extradition laws and make it easier to remove war crimes suspects. Once passed, the bill will allow Canada to extradite suspects to international tribunals, such as those currently investigating atrocities in Bosnia and Rwanda and to a proposed United Nations permanent international criminal court. Under current law, Canada can extradite suspects only to 50 countries with which we have treaties.

ISRAEL

Joint Centre Planned

BEERSHEVA — Israel's first joint conversion institute could be established within two months, says the chair of the seven-member board set up for the institution. Earlier this year, as part of a compromise to avert a crisis over who would perform conversions in Israel the suggestion was made to create this kind of institute.

Ben-Porat Report Critical

JERUSALEM — Miriam Ben Porat, Israel's state comptroller, has released a report charging the government with giving too much money to the haredi community, and the Israel Defense Force with failing to take effective action against terrorists and criminals.

Ben-Porat attributed what she called the preferential treatment given to yeshivot to political pressure on the government and the coalition agreements Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu signed with the haredi parties when he formed his government.

Book for Deaf Published

HAIFA — The first video book in Hebrew designed especially for the hearing impaired has been produced by the University of Haifa. The book presents Hans Christian Andersen's The Emperor's New Clothes in sign language. The story is acted out and told in sign by deaf actress Tami Salomon. The video book is available from the sign language laboratory at the University of Haifa.

WORLD

Kalejs Case Dropped

SYDNEY — Australia has dropped an investigation into war criminal Konrads Kalejs, a former lieutenant in a Latvian killing unit who holds Australian citizenship. Police officials cited insufficient evidence against Kalejs, 84, while Prime Minister John Howard said Australian law prevents the country from stripping Kalejs of his citizenship.

In 1997, Kalejs was removed from Canada for participating in war crimes. Earlier, Kalejs lost his American citizenship and was deported for taking part in the persecution of civilians during World War II.

Austria Holds Memorial

VIENNA — Austria recently held its first annual national remembrance day for Holocaust victims. The government chose May 5 because the Mauthausen concentration camp in central Austria was liberated by Allied troops on that date in 1945. A nationally televised session of both houses of Parliament was one of the day's events.

Racist Attacks Up

BERLIN — Racist and anti-Semitic attacks by German far-right extremists rose in 1997 over the previous year, according to government statistics. In its annual report on militant groups, Germany's internal security service said there were 790 such attacks last year, a 27 percent increase over 1996. The estimated number of incidents in recent German newspaper reports was even higher.

Astronaut Wins Award

INDIANAPOLIS — Astronaut David Wolf, a local resident, has been named the 1998 recipient of the annual HIA-Life Award for distinguished leadership by the Hasten Hebrew Academy of Indianapolis, the city's only Jewish Day School.

The award is presented annually to a person or couple who advance the cause of education in the city. Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel is a past recipient.

Rohatyner Sought

NEW YORK — Rohatyn Societies and Affiliated Individuals is seeking people who originate from the towns surrounding the Rohatyn ghetto (in western Ukraine during World War II), to attend a dedication this summer to honor those who died in the Holocaust, and to mark 600 years of Jewish existence in the area. For information call Herman Shkolnick, 718-633-2030 or Donia Schwartzstein 718-897-2110; or write Schwartzstein, c/o D. Schwartz, FDR Station, Box 1265, New York, N.Y. 10150.

Women Warned About Drug

NEW YORK — With the recent news that tamoxifen, when taken prophylactically, may prevent breast cancer, health experts at Hadassah, The Women's Zionist Organization of America, are concerned that Jewish women may be jumping to conclusions about the usefulness of the drug to combat certain types of breast cancers genetically inherited by the Ashkenazi population.

"We are encouraged by the clinical study on tamoxifen, but it is important that the Jewish community does not rush to embrace the results of the study before further investigation concerning the gene alterations take place. As of now, we have no proof that tamoxifen will act prophylactically in cases of genetic alteration," said Dale Mintz, director of health education at Hadassah.

Genetically inherited breast cancer runs in families, with multiple members of the family getting either breast or ovarian cancer. "If you have reason to believe that you are a member of a family that is at high-risk, you should seek genetic counselling," Mintz said.

Ne'eman holds forth on unity, financial issues

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israeli cabinet minister Ya'acov Ne'eman recently treated a select group attending a roundtable luncheon to his views on Jewish unity and financial issues.

"Despite the Holocaust, we have not learned the lesson that we have to be a united nation," said Ne'eman, who serves as Israel's minister of finance and who chaired the Committee for Conversion Law. "Unfortunately, we do not cope with the main problem of Jewish existence."

The venue for Ne'eman's address was a luncheon sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University and Counsel Corporation. Punctuating his remarks with biblical references, Ne'eman described the work of the conversion committee as "more important than anything else."

Assimilation rates in San Francisco approach 85 percent, Ne'eman said. What Hitler did not accomplish in gas chambers, "we are accomplishing with the souls of Jews."

He quoted the rabbinic sage, Rambam, commenting on the book of Vayikrah that a precondition for peace with Israel's neighbors must be peace among Jews. Ne'eman called for Jewish unity founded on "basic principles of Judaism – that God created us, gave us the Torah and that the Torah can't be changed by a human being" and that is the duty of every Jew to perform mitzvot.

"Each one of us can perform mitzvot and it's not up to us to impose [anything] on anyone else," he said.

Turning his attention to the work of the conversion committee, Ne'eman said three Orthodox rabbis, one each from the Reform and Conservative movements and two laymen participated in its deliberations. After seven months, they were able to reach "an understanding," not a compromise, he stressed.

The committee suggested forming an Institute for Jewish Studies under the umbrella of the Jewish Agency to introduce primarily Russian immigrants to the world of Judaism. That would open the door for them to seek conversion.

In Israel, 80 members of the Knesset endorsed the report and the cabinet approved it. Only the "ultra-Orthodox and the ultra-left opposed it," he said.

"Unfortunately, when the committee issued its report, rabbis from the Diaspora started to intervene and bring the disagreements they have imported to Israel," he added.

Ne'eman said one problem that spurred emotions in Israel was an announcement that the U.S. Reform movement would officiate at same-sex marriages.

"It's even hard for me to admit that this is Judaism," he said. "I think this is a slap in the face of trying to find unity. I definitely object that this is a Jewish marriage. Nevertheless, despite this spit in the face of Jewish unity, I think we should go ahead and try to find [it].

"There are hundreds of thousands of immigrants from[Russia] who are not Jewish" but who have immigrated to Israel. Some have been killed on duty in Lebanon. While Judaism does not encourage conversions, "things today are different," Ne'eman said.

Turning to economic issues, Ne'eman said Israel is in a transition period, moving "from textiles to technology." Israel can't compete with the salaries workers receive in the Far East, so it must focus on the high-tech sphere. Israel today is second in the world in startup companies in high-tech industries while last year the country increased its exports of high-tech products by 25 percent, he said.

Coverage of Israel's 50th

The extent of the media's coverage in Canada, and indeed throughout the western world, of Israel's 50th anniversary, was in and of itself a remarkable phenomenon of some significance.

That the Jewish press would provide "extra special" coverage of the anniversary was to be expected. But rarely have we seen such concentrated journalistic treatment in the Canadian media – newspapers, magazines, radio and television – dedicated to the national celebrations of another country.

Now that the stories and features appear to be winding down, it is worthwhile to try to place both the extent and the nature of the reportage of the 50th anniversary into some broader context and framework. To do this, I called one of the community's, and I would even add, one of the country's sharpest observers of the media.

Paul Michaels has been the communications analyst researcher at the Canada-Israel Committee for more than a decade. He brings to his work an academic's disposition, a philosopher's curiosity and a historian's approach.

For most of his adult life, he has keenly observed the traffic that careens off the pages and around the airwaves at the West's four-way intersection of journalism, reporting, news and bias.

In a modest midtown Toronto office, crowded in every corner with stacks of files, reams of articles and journals, and piles of books, Michaels monitors the media's coverage of Israel.

I asked his opinions not only on the substance of some of the stories that we read or heard or saw in the last few weeks, but also on the "coverage phenomenon" itself.

Michaels agreed that the sheer volume of the media reports and commentary was, of itself, a statement about the media. As he eloquently said, the "Jewish saga," which of course in our day and age includes as its centerpiece the State of Israel, continues to captivate the western media.

One of the incidental benefits of the special occasion coverage of Israel at 50, he pointed out, was the fact that many reporters and commentators, some for the first time, found it appropriate to discuss the idea that Israel's creation in 1948 was the fulfilment of thousands of years of attachment by a people that persisted in the face of overwhelming odds and refused to give up hope.

In typically analytical fashion, he suggested that a "media dynamic" was created by the anniversary in which it became "acceptable" for some journalists to acknowledge some of the "metaphysical" facts of Jewish-Israeli history.

We both agreed that a particularly effective example of this manner of exploration into Jewish-Israeli history was the commentary by Michael Enright on the special Israel at 50 edition of This Morning on Sunday, April 26.

"What it must have been like to have been in that room that day, or outside where crowds had gathered in the heat! I'm a non-Jew, but I think I would have wept and sung as well, because in a real sense, the creation of Israel was a political miracle, born of a dramatic mixture of courage, sacrifice, will and an overarching sense of destiny.

"But despite the tentativeness [of the mood], the story of Israel from the three millennia [to] this very morning, is wondrously bold in its unfolding. It is a story of blood and beginnings, of small miracles and great disasters, of majesty and pain, and fulfilment and loss…

"Certainly I was confused. Yet the more I listened, the clearer there began to form an image of people unlike any other in western history, the Jews, and how they created a tiny national home east of Eden; because that is where the promise of their God would be fulfilled." (Excerpted from the transcripts.)

Statements such as those above by Enright, however, were more the exception than the rule. Michaels noted that several familiar "shortcomings" still predominated in the media's presentation of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

• Simplistic and non-contextualized reporting of the Arab refugee situation that developed as a result of the fighting in 1947 and 1948. The picture most frequently painted was that the Israelis simply dispossessed the Palestinians of their home and property. It is the view propagated by the Palestinians. It ignores the larger truths of the context of the war and the behavior of the Palestinians themselves and of their own leaders.

• Conversely, virtual silence on the plight of the Jewish refugees who were forced to flee their Muslim host countries after the creation of Israel. The number of Jewish refugees was approximately equal to the number of Palestinian refugees. Their respective fates make for an illuminating contrast. But that contrast was left unexplored.

• No broader regional perspective was given to the conflict.

• No mention whatsoever was made of the use by Palestinian political institutions of terrorism as a weapon or, conversely, of the total rejection, before 1993, of compromise and diplomacy as a means of procedure.

There was much more that Michaels explained to me. My conversation with him was a personal seminar in media analysis.

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto needs a full-time, professional beit din (rabbinical court), rather than the ad-hoc, volunteer-based beit din it currently has, a Toronto lawyer says.

A beit din here could be modeled on the system in Britain, where rabbinical courts have full-time, professional administrators and registrars, Gene Colman said last week at a conference entitled Justice and Jewish Law.

The inaugural conference brought together Jewish lawyers and experts on Halachah for a day of sessions on how secular and religious law need not conflict, and could even complement each other in the modern world.

Beit dins, comprised of three rabbis or experts on Halachah, are now "in" again, said Colman, a family lawyer, because the legal system prefers that cases be settled outside the clogged courts.

Legal wrangles in Canada are often settled by Alternate Dispute Resolution (ADR), a mechanism in which the parties agree to abide by private arbitration. Colman said "there is no better time" than now to establish the beit din as an ADR.

Jewish lawyers must be persuaded that their Jewish clients would be better served by a beit din, while non-Jewish lawyers have to be convinced that a beit din can serve as a valid ADR, Colman said.

However, procedures must be "adapted" so that parties stay out of secular courts, and the beit din must "insulate" itself against appeals to secular courts.

Two requirements are needed for a full-time beit din, said Colman: accessibility and public education. Aggrieved parties must know they can have access to a beit din, and lawyers should be allowed to examine witnesses before the rabbinical panel.

If lawyers are excluded from a beit din, he cautioned, it would have no chance of becoming established.

Another problem, he warned, is testimony from women and non-Jews. Denying those, as beit dins often do, would render their judgment open to appeal to secular courts.

Colman said he sees "no reason" why the problem faced by agunot (women denied a Jewish divorce) could not be "eradicated" by a full-time beit din in Toronto.

Rabbi Michael Broyde, director of the Beth Din of America, said the "essence" of a modern beit din is to have members who have sufficient knowledge of the society and culture in which it functions.

"If you want a beit din that works and has respect, you have to establish rules that reflect the realities of the times," said Rabbi Broyde, who also teaches law at Emory University in Atlanta.

Dayanim (judges) must be familiar with common, commercial practices and the rules of society of general, he said. Pulpit rabbis are excluded from his beit din because they are not perceived as impartial, he added.

It's not hard to establish a full-time beit din, Rabbi Broyde said, just expensive. The Beth Din of America has an annual operating budget of $250,000.

Other topics examined at the conference included wills and estate planning; legal and halachic issues of reproductive technology; and intellectual property and Halachah.

The conference was co-hosted by Beth Jacob V'Anshe Drildz Congregation, and Kedma, an Israeli-based university student organization.

The conference was organized and co-hosted by Rabbis Jay and Maury Kelman.

Israel must keep talking about peace: Burg

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Peace talks between Israel and the Arabs must continue "because without talking about peace we will never have it," former Israeli cabinet minister Dr. Yosef Burg said here.

The 90-year-old head and founder of the National Religious Party (NRP), a key part of the present Israeli cabinet, said without peace Israel will not have the friendship of the western powers. "Nobody in the world will be with us," he said "If we don't have friendship with the United States there will be no investment in our economy and no aliyah."

At the same time, he said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu faced "an impossible mission in his negotiations in London.

"I don't recall a prime minister having so many problems," said the man who has been in the cabinet of every Israeli government from 1952 to 1988.

Burg was speaking to a breakfast meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, chaired by Rabbi Dow Marmur, Holy Blossom Temple.

The situation has changed since he was a cabinet minister "because now we are dealing with the second and third generation of sophisticated Palestinians."

No solution is possible without understanding Yasser Arafat, he said. "If Arafat means what he says I can't tell you. I'm in favor of a skeptical attitude."

Burg said he was glad to see outspoken right-wing ministers in the cabinet. "I see something good in that. "

He added: "Why should Arafat give in to us when the Jewish people want to give up land?"

The majority of Israeli people do not want another conversion centre he said in answer to a question about the Ne'eman Committee.

"In the Diaspora a converted person is accepted by the community, but in Israel it is by the country as such. Give us time, we'll find a solution."

In an earlier interview, Burg commented on the rift between secular and observant Jews in Israel, saying "the extremists on the extreme religious right and the left are over-acting. I have no doubt that as before, the NRP will again be the force of the middle. Middle of the road does not mean mediocrity.

'I am in favor of a tough stand'

"We believe in the unity of the Jewish people and the unity of national religious values and we have to act accordingly," he told The CJN's Paul Lungen. "I am against blowing up certain conflicts. We are fighting for survival and should not raise issues that have divided the Jewish people for more than 150 years [since the rise of the Reform and Conservative movements].

"There should not be import of religious issues that exist in the United States much more than in Israel."

On the question of giving up land, Burg said "I am in favor of a tough stand..."

"As always, there's a question: What are the alternatives? To plunge the country into election struggles just when the maximum fortitude is called for would be disastrous. The choice is not between good and bad but between bad and worse."

He said the NRP should stand behind Netanyahu in "trying to get a compromise with the Arabs that will not affect our security. We cannot accept any proposal that would not give full security to Israel and to every one of our citizens," he said.

Adding to misconception

When these words were being written, what was certain was that President Bill Clinton, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Chairman Yasser Arafat would not be meeting in Washington this week. It now appears, but is also far from certain, that such a summit meeting may take place in Washington later in the month.

Apparently, special U.S. envoy Dennis Ross flew back to Washington last Sunday after three days of negotiations with Israeli and Palestinian leaders with a new proposal related to IDF redeployment in the West Bank to present to the president.

That proposal, according to news sources, requires an unspecified amount of West Bank territory, presumably somewhere within the difference between the 13 percent further withdrawal that the Americans are "suggesting" and the nine percent that the Israelis are offering, to be held in escrow, and to be transferred to the Palestinians at a later date pending the fulfilment of certain conditions.

If the White House accepts this newest proposal, the summit will yet be convened before the summer.

What was also certain as these words were being written, was that the leadership of the Palestinian Authority (PA) must have been enjoying the sight of Israel negotiating directly and apparently quite fiercely with its ally, benefactor and friend, the United States, over issues that the PA has manipulated in the public's mind as a possible peace process meltdown.

And it's a ploy Arafat has used a number of times.

In the agreement that enshrined the terms of the IDF withdrawal from Hebron, Arafat agreed that Israel alone would have the right to determine the extent of the three troop redeployments prior to final status talks. But some months ago, as soon as Israel announced the extent of the next intended troop withdrawal, Arafat publicly denounced it as unacceptable and a violation of "Oslo." He thus reneged on the commitments he had signed and in doing so cast further doubt among Israelis who follow the details of the process and not merely its rhetoric, on the reliability of his promises and on the promise of his reliability.

He used exactly the same tactic after the announcement by Israel that it would build housing on Har Choma, a hilltop in southern Jerusalem.

The Oslo accords specifically exclude any prohibition against Israel of building in the Jerusalem area. And yet, Arafat suspended the peace process on the pretext, factually false, that Israel's plan to build houses on Har Choma , to "Judaize" Jerusalem as he called it, was a violation of Oslo.

The peace process has been in suspended animation ever since, with Israel cast on the stage of public opinion as the intransigent party and the PA as the willing, but unrequited peace partner.

This, of course, is an inversion of the truth. Unfortunately for Israel, and more importantly, for the peace process, the recent posturing by the American administration is adding to the public's false conceptions of responsibility for the stalemate in the talks.

Commendable change of heart

Premier Mike Harris of Ontario is to be commended for changing his mind last week on the possibility of assisting all victims of the tainted blood scandal. The premier's decision caused Federal Health Minister Allan Rock to convene a meeting today of all the health ministers of the country with a view to reaching a new consensus on financial assistance to all the victims.

Since Harris' announcement, Premier Lucien Bouchard of Quebec has also performed an about-face on the issue. Some other premiers may soon follow suit.

The impact of the announcements by both Ontario and Quebec was only slightly diminished by the accompanying tired and tawdry polemics against the principled, closely-reasoned, if misguided, position of the federal government. Pouncing into the opening created by the prime minister's heavy-handed insistence that the vote in the Commons last week be considered a vote of confidence, the premiers were merely settling more old scores.

Differs with Peter Munk on Swiss experience

Re: Peter Munk's defence of Switzerland (CJN, April 16).

Undoubtedly, it is praiseworthy that Munk and members of his family were saved by fleeing to Switzerland. But this is not about those of us who could financially afford the price to stay alive. My family left Germany in July 1939 for Belgium.

This is about the people like my aunt, who was refused entry when she attempted to flee from France to Switzerland in 1942 and was handed back to the Vichy authorities – to be gassed in Auschwitz.

This is about Switzerland's overall behavior toward Jews. Certainly, the country could have afforded to let the 30,000-odd Jews enter rather than condemn them to their certain death. It is true that other countries refused to allow Jews to immigrate, but here was a case where people appeared at the doorstep.

Could this be related to the fact that Swiss banks may have had to repay funds they had on deposit because some of these people had accounts there? If the Swiss had had to repay those funds at that time, it might have cut their overall lending capability to real estate, mining companies and others. After all, the funds they lent were intermingled with Jewish funds, which they are now asked to return.

Munk is right in telling us that his family paid to be saved, and he praises the Swiss diplomat in Hungary for saving Jews. But this is about the multitude and not the privileged few. Munk then, and again now, belongs to the latter.

Disliked CJN coverage of Mimouna

As an Israeli-born Jew of Iraqi-Jewish descent, I find it disheartening to witness the stereotypical coverage of the Sephardi community here in Canada and in Israel ("Celebrating Mimouna, Here and There," CJN, April 23).

The unflattering photo portrayal of a Moroccan family's Mimouna picnic in a park in Israel was juxtaposed with a 2-inch x 2-inch photo of a grandparent holding a child while attending the April 19 community Mimouna at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill.

This Mimouna celebration marking the end of Pesach was a hands-on Jewish experience for 500 Sephardim and Ashkenazim. The CJN's coverage was not thoughtful or responsible.

Yom Hashoah in Israel

Israel, April 23/98, 9:59 a.m.

Even though I go to Israel once a year, this is the first time that I'm able to observe Yom Hashoah with the rest of the country.

The sirens start at exactly 10 a.m., and I am standing at the windows, looking out. The merchant across the street stops stacking his shelves with vegetables, two tomatoes still in his hand. Four soldiers get out of their car. They stand, two on each side, their heads bowed. A truck driver jumps out of his cab, and stands at attention.

It is so different experiencing these two minutes in person rather than watching them on TV, or reading about them in a newspaper.

It leaves me drained emotionally and proud that I am here to share it with all.

Jewish brothers in the former FSU

I was most impressed by the article by James Nahon entitled "We must not forget Jewish Brothers in the FSU." (CJN, April 16)

This article has special meaning for me, as I was born in Drahobych, one of the shtetlach visited by Nahon and his group as part of the Pesach Project. I was touched to read about the seders that took place in Truskavec, Borislav and Drahobych with the remaining Jews of those communities.

I was forced out of Drahobych in 1944, when the Nazis evacuated the Jews, and I was sent to my first of several concentration camps in Plaszow. I never again saw my home town or my family.

I often recall that there were 14,000 Jews in Drahobych before the war, and Jewish life there flourished. The famous rabbi, Dr. Jacob Avigdor, presided proudly over the Jewish community. During my youth, I often travelled from Drahobych to Borislav and Truskavec, and was so familiar with these towns that I recognized every stone along the way. Although Jews in these towns were not wealthy, Yiddishkeit prospered.

Reading about Nahon's travels and experiences brought back many fond memories and the good times of my childhood years. It is comforting to hear that the few remaining Jews of these once thriving Jewish communities have not been, and hopefully will not be, forgotten. Nahon's efforts to remind us of our responsibilities to our Jewish brothers are commendable.

The tchines of women's prayers

By BARBARA RAUBFOGEL

Through the ages when Jews sought wisdom, they looked to the sayings of the fathers as their guide. Learned men have always been our mentors. Traditionally, women's lives were also exemplary, although their role was more circumscribed. Wives and mothers who were excluded (or excused) from active participation in the cheder and the yeshivah created the necessary atmosphere for study in the home.

Although their formal religious education and their participation in the synagogue was minimal, these women constructed a framework to suit their devotional and intellectual needs. By the end of the 19th century, when Hebrew was taught to some women, many women continued to read tchines, devotional books written in Judeo-German.

Recently, thanks to the work of women scholars, many of these tchines have been translated into English. Chava Weissler, who has written extensively on the subject, based her translations on a 1796 edition published in Horodno. In her attempt to bring the reader as close to the original as possible, she retains the Yiddish spelling of the original and uses names and typical expressions in the English text.

The Yiddish texts were read with faith and devotion by eastern European women, and their enduring popularity can be seen in a short story by Y.L. Peretz. In Der ziveg, oder Sarah Bas Tovim, a tchine writer is depicted as a fairy godmother/folk heroine. This genre of voluntary "women's" prayers evolved over centuries. Derived from the Hebrew word techinot, tchines were supplications that were not time bound, and yet held religious significance for particular events in Ashkenazi women's lives. Recited in Yiddish, usually in the home, the majority of these were petitions concerning children and family. On reading many of the prayers, one notes that the focus is on what observant men might perceive as the religious domain of women.

Consequently, while the daily prayers addressed collective concerns, the tchines were intensely personal and proved popular with the "ordinary folk." Printed editions of siddur and Bible translations in early Yiddish had first appeared in the mid-16th century. Later, tachanun (supplicatory prayers for Mondays and Thursdays) appeared among the texts that were translated. These were based on a talmudic form known as techinot, originally intended to allow for individual private devotion during services. Women's techinot first appeared in the mid-17th century in the Ashkenazi communities of western Europe. Since then, the term tchines has been associated with women's prayers. Among the techinot which appeared in eastern Europe were those written by and for women.

Sarah Rebecca Rachel Leah Horowitz (c 1726-c 1800?) was an accomplished tchine writer. According to the memoirs of 18th-century writer Dov Ber Birkenthal, she was living as a young married woman in the home of her brother, who was the rabbi of Bolechow, a city in Polish Galicia in the year 1735. Birkenthal remarks on her great talmudic learning.

She wrote the Tchine of Matriarchs, which was intended to be recited in synagogue on the Sabbath preceding Rosh Chodesh, during the ritual of blessing the coming month. In the preamble, she assures us that she is not merely a woman but the daughter of the "brilliant and famous rabbi" Yokel Segal Horowitz, head of the rabbinical court of Glogau, and wife of the "brilliant and acute luminary," Rabbi Shabbetai, head of the rabbinical court of Krasny.

With such authority, Leah Horowitz insists that: "On the Sabbath, one should speak only words of Torah, each according to his ability. And he who cannot study Torah, and also women, should read in Yiddish; they should know how to observe their commandments."

Horowitz, who came from a famous Galician rabbinic family, understood the meaning of her religious acts somewhat differently than the male writers did. In the prayer, Tchine Imohes, we read about a woman's concern with the power and importance of prayer. In her Hebrew introduction to this prayer, which was omitted from later versions, Horowitz argues forcefully that women have greater religious importance and that therefore their prayers are more significant than was generally thought. Very few women at that time were educated in Hebrew, and Horowitz's two-page introduction literally had no audience. Had they known, the women of Bolechow might have been upset to learn that Horowitz did not regard them as sufficiently motivated. Women's prayers "counted" only when undertaken with proper devotion, Horowitz said, and it was women's inattention that was blocking the redemptive power of their prayers.

Using images familiar to her from her family background in her supplication, Horowitz argues that proper prayer is for the sake of Shchinah (the presence of God).

Finally, in taking up the famous talmudic passage, "By what means do women acquire merit?" (Berachot 17a), Horowitz shows her familiarity with the style of halachic debate. She tells her readers that they can achieve merit through erudition, above and beyond that merit acquired by sending their men off to study and pray as the rabbi would have them do. Horowitz would have known that the passage from Berachot ends with, "Greater is the promise made by the Holy One, blessed be He, to the women than to the men; for it says, 'Rise up ye women that are at ease; ye confident daughters, give ear unto my speech.' "

Horowitz was an exceptional woman. Her background allowed her access to the language of study and she could therefore read the sermons and discourses of the rebbes. By extension, she may have been able to achieve the status of tzaddik. A woman who lived in close proximity to a rebbe, as Horowitz did, could, through her intellectual accomplishments and her association with him, step out of the margins. The author of Tchine Imohes, however, remained within the margins.

These photos from A Vanished World by Roman Vishniac, (Farrar, Straus & Giroux), are of women who would have been among those described by the author as likely readers of tchines.

Weissler maintains that although Horowitz may have had a novel approach to the area of religious life reserved for men or those matters "of the world to come," in this life and in her world, men defined the religious domain. Horowitz knew that most women were unable to comprehend the regular services and hence were likely to lack kavanah (sincerity or devotion). She did not consider her prayers inferior, because Chassidism had never shown condescension to Yiddish prayers. Horowitz's attempts to legitimate participation in the traditionally male domains of talmudic discussion and halachic argument, however, should be seen as applying only to women such as herself, who were a distinct minority. This mixed picture of women's role can be substantiated by examining other tchines.

In the Tchine Shloyshe She'orim, attributed to Sarah Bas Tovim, we are told that inside one of the six chambers of paradise is to be found the chamber of the matriarchs. Only there could women engage in the most holy of activities — the study of Torah. The majority of eastern European women lived out their lives reading their prayers in the Yiddish vernacular or in Hebrew, a language they did not understand. A poignant case in point is a woman in 19th-century Germany who recalled notations in the margins of prayer-books suggesting the appropriate reactions and emotions: "One cries at this point." The sad fact remains that the majority of tchine readers would have to wait for the world to come to be lernen toyre (studying Torah).

The women writers, however, saw to their readers' spiritual needs, and were aided by popular demand and the advent of printing. The exact process by which this genre developed cannot be traced, but one theory is that the zogerkes or firzogerins (learned women) translated the prayers for the benefit of those less educated. They also instructed their readers as to how their prayers could be most effective.

Sarah Bas Tovim believed in the efficacy of her prayers to expiate the sin of pride and cancel the punishment of wandering. She was arguably the most popular of the tchine writers. Born in the Ukraine in the 17th century and the daughter of a rabbi, she was possibly a firzogerin in her synagogue. Aside from Shloyshe She'orim, she was also known for her book Sheker Hacheyn, literally "beauty lies."

Sarah Bas Tovim interpreted her life's travails as a punishment for her sins: "I the woman, Sore [Sarah], beseech the young women not to converse in the beloved holy shul. I am warning you [so] that you should not be punished, as I have been with wandering." She began to use her wealth – which she had once immodestly displayed – to help others. She served as a role model that men supported and even co-opted. It was a fairly common practice in the 19th century for male writers to appropriate Sarah Bas Tovim's name.

Although the authorship of many tchines is in dispute, there is no question that the majority of these prayers were written for the benefit of the women who read them. This is evident from their content. These women duly noted their status as wife of, sister of and daughter of; yet pride of authorship is evident in many collections. Tchines were more than a vehicle for spirituality; they were a means of self-expression for some women at a time when there were few such means.

In a Y.L. Peretz story, Devotion Without End, we are told that when the sainted Miriam's soul rose to heaven, the saints of paradise were waiting. When she was led to the Seat of Judgment, she was asked, "Did you study the Torah?" She replied, "Lord of the Universe, have you ever directed the daughters of Israel to study your Torah?"

Boycotting Jubilee Bells

When the bridge fell at last summer's Maccabiah Games, it was a disaster so horrible words couldn't describe it.

By Viva Press in Halifax

People rightfully questioned how it could have happened. Those responsible for the construction of the bridge, we said, should be charged.

One would think that after such a blunder the company responsible for the bridge would have gone under. Who would hire it again?

Israel's Ministry of Tourism, that's who.

The Maccabiah bridge was supposed to be one of the greatest pieces of engineering Israel had yet to see. So, when it was time to build a most glorious stage for Israel's Jubilee Bells – the national ceremony for Israel's 50th anniversary – who better to call upon than the builders of the bridge?

But for some reason, I still can't overlook the fact that Irgunit, the company responsible for the Maccabiah Games and for all the smaller companies that worked under it, was chosen for the jubilee. What an absurd choice.

My friend Joanna and I came to Israel from Toronto for a couple of weeks to celebrate the 50th anniversary here. Originally, we had planned to be in Jerusalem.

When we heard about the Jubilee Bells it sounded like a lot of fun.

This was a once-in-a-lifetime experience; so we agreed to splurge on tickets to the event.

Upon hearing who was in charge of the Jubilee Bells event, however, we agreed to boycott it.

Our boycott had no effect in the general scheme of things. But we couldn't justify handing over more than 100 shekels to a company that has all but overlooked the victims of the Maccabiah bridge tragedy.

Does government care?

Does Irgunit care that there is still – a year after the collapse – a 10-year-old Australian girl in hospital? Does Israel care?

I'm not sure the government cares. I know that many of my friends and family here care. They, too, "boycotted" the Jubilee Bells for the same reason.

What was the explanation for why this company – over all others – was given the Jubilee Bells contract?

Many of the people I've asked simply replied: "Protekzia. Someone's brother or sister or relative is in the government."

Whatever the "official" reason is, the question of whether or not justice will be served in the Maccabiah disaster remains.

Now that the Jubilee Bells celebration went off as a hit success, I hope that does not allow a slowing down in the investigation into the Maccabiah tragedy.

So, this anniversary turned out to be bittersweet.

Joanna and I did celebrate. Don't think otherwise. We went to Hod HaSharon, a town just north of Tel Aviv. There we – and about 5,000 others – celebrated Israel's 50 years of existence with fireworks, silly string, shaving cream, balloons, candy apples and music.

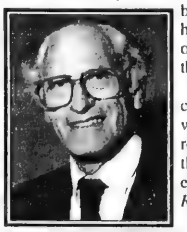
Actually, as it turns out, Hod HaSharon had one of the country's best venues. Rita, Israel's most celebrated singer – and the one who sang Hatikvah at the jubilee ceremony for an estimated 50,000 shekels – sang for us for free, as did Yehudit Ravitz and Chaim Moshe. It was a lot of fun.

Because Israel has overcome so much in its 50 years, I have faith that it can overcome and explain its reason for giving the jubilee contract to an organization still under police and court investigation. I also have faith that those responsible for the Maccabiah tragedy will be dutifully brought to justice.

And when that happens there will be nothing but praise for the little country that could.

Are we wired to be religious?

Readers of this column are by now accustomed to the fact that I read some far-out magazines. Only by plumbing some different and often startling ideas can I begin to comprehend the full range of contemporary thinking.



By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

An article that caught my attention was written by Jeremiah Creedon in the March/ April edition of the Utne Reader.

Creedon calls our attention to two books published in the United States. One, by James B. Ashbrook and Carol Rausch Albright, is called The Humanizing Brain; the other is entitled How The Mind Works and was written by Steven Pinker.

One thesis of the first book is this: "Archeological evidence of religious observances indicates that we have been religious for as long as we have been homo sapiens, perhaps longer."

The human brain, the authors claim, has evolved to look for meaning in life – something that we do not (and perhaps cannot) know about other creatures on this earth. Thus our brains are hard-wired for meaning, so that most of us find religion a natural outlet and are not satisfied to believe that we are the "be all and end all" of creation, but that there is something beyond. That perception is as old as humanity, the authors believe, and therefore a most profoundly human capacity. The brain, they say, represents a basic and universal structure that underlies all belief systems.

Creedon ends his article with this observation: "What are we to make of these efforts to reconcile science and religion? Do they mark the birth of a new faith better suited to the modern mind, or another vain attempt to "prove" the existence of cosmic meaning? That's hard to say. But with neuronauts (the new scientists concerned with studying the brain and its functions) poised to replace both Freud and the physicist as the secular high priests of the next century, one thing seems fairly certain: The language of neuroscience could soon be taken for the word of God, even if it isn't."

But Pinker disagrees. He is of the opinion that the brain is nothing more than the application of two roles that are provided by the brain, which means that the brain is limited by its own capacity to solve problems. But religion poses problems that cannot be solved, and therefore the brain is, by definition, not a means of religious cognition.

"We are organisms," says Pinker, "not angels, and our minds are organs, not pipelines to the truth. Our minds evolve by natural selection to solve problems that were life-and-death matters to our ancestors, not to commune with correctness or to answer any questions we were capable of asking."

There you have protagonist and antagonist arrayed for battle against each other.

Does Jewish tradition have anything to say on these matters? It knew nothing of neuronauts, but it did perceive of the idea that all humans have basic obligations vis-a-vis their own existence, which means that they were indeed hard-wired to this extent. We are, in other words, not like blank sheets of paper on which nothing is written. There is a basic script for living that is instilled in all of us.

The Anatomy of an All-Nighter

In the final stretch of this semester, I have been striving to earn "credits" in a new course I created at McGill.

The title of the course is The Anatomy of an All-Nighter, 24-7-365B. The course is physically and emotionally demanding, but it motivates the students to literally see the light at the end of the tunnel.

By Justin Korda in Montreal

The course usually begins at around 9 p.m. At this point, the students, who are not yet sure of their commitment to the all-nighter class, begin working on whatever assignment is due the next day. At around 1 a.m., the students realize that they will be participating in the course with complete dedication.

At this point, the students' energy begins to flag. They falsely believe that time is now on their side as a result of the new course they are taking. Between 1 a.m. and 5 a.m., school work is inserted between waves of intergalactic cogitation indulgence – normally referred to as daydreaming.

The conclusion of the course usually begins at 5 a.m. and endures until the very last possible minute – or sooner, pending the completion of the assignment. It is in this concluding period that the students' productivity is tested as a function of adrenaline level. (If this scenario actually sounds remotely familiar to any readers, please look into joining my Study Club, where we do pretty much everything other than what our name suggests.)

I thought that it would be fitting to crown my final all-nighter of the semester with a course evaluation; hence the composition of this column as the clock ticks down the last few hours. The thoughts that have been surfing through my mind during the daydreaming period have been focused on my immediate future – after my all-nighter career.

Leaning back in my chair sipping coffee and staring out the window at the tranquil night, I was transported to an experience I had had a week earlier. I was attending a Job Fair convention, where students and employers are invited to respectively find employment and workers.

Surrounding me were many students who were desperately looking for summer employment in fields such as computer programming and mechanical engineering. On their resumes, which were superimposed onto large Bristol board, these students listed mathematical and scientific formulas as second languages, in order to demonstrate their proficiency. Needless to say, my political science background did not prepare me for this environment. And for that matter, neither did the fact that I had my Bristol board indicate my specialties as: "good humored, talkative, sleep deprived and prone to make workplace fun."

The experience at the Job Market was, however, quite fascinating. We were served freshly brewed coffee, which was a blessing since I had had my "class" the night before. Strolling back and forth from the coffee machine to my Bristol board, I recognized that I was at the threshold of summer, pending a decision that has lifetime ramifications. Although that first glimpse of sun is so uplifting and that first taste of warm weather is so delicious, summer is often the time that students are faced with a harsh decision. Will this be the last summer of fun or the first summer of seriousness and maturity?

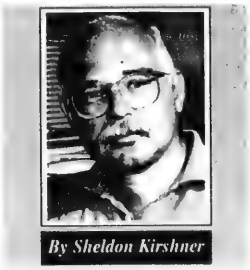
In the face of this choice, my palms began to sweat, my heart escalated in tempo and my teeth were clenched in panic. My inability to answer the above question stems from two wills that seem to be pulling in opposite directions. On one hand is the desire to remain young, high spirited and idealistic; on the other hand, is the eagerness to achieve an element of independence and take on personal responsibility. There is, however, some hope, for these are not necessarily opposites. Surely, the two can exist together. Right?

Well, I guess this is a query that I will inevitably be answering as soon as I complete the requirements of my final anatomy class, The Anatomy of an All-Nighter. In the meantime, I wish everyone a fulfilling summer, whatever their choices.

The Kirshner File

Israel as seen through a floodtide of books

According to the secular calendar, Israel's diamond jubilee falls on May 14. Israel's 50th anniversary is as good



By Sheldon Kirshner

an occasion as any to dip into the floodtide of books about Israel, Zionism and Hebrew that have been published of late.

Marlin Levin, a young American journalist, immigrated to Palestine in August 1947, three months before the United Nations General Assembly voted to partition the country into Jewish and Arab states. Among his possessions was a 35 mm camera and a supply of Kodachrome film. He put them to good use, judging by The Birth of Israel (Gefen), a vivid photographic record of contrasting images from then and now.

The 62 color pictures in this album are mainly of everyday life in Palestine and Israel. They call out for attention precisely because they are prosaic and unpretentious and, therefore, real.

Occasionally, he returns to the original scene, comparing the past with the present. By virtue of its naturalistic photos, The Birth of Israel ranks as a compelling volume.

Tom Segev, an Israeli historian, draws on declassified documents and personal diaries and correspondence to reconstruct Israel's first year of statehood. 1949: The First Israelis (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), originally published to coincide with Israel's 40th anniversary, has been reissued in a paperback edition with a new introduction by the author. Writing with compassion and conviction, Segev paints a portrait of a society caught up in the wrenching and amazing drama of nation-building.

Beryl Ratzer, in A Historical Tour of the Holy Land (Gefen), provides readers with a sweeping survey of Israel from the Middle Bronze age to the present. This slim but informative volume, which appears geared to the younger set, contains useful maps and charts as well as striking photographs.

When modern Zionism emerged, it was, to some extent, embraced by assimilated European Jews, including Theodor Herzl. Michael Berkowitz, in Zionist Culture and West European Jewry Before the First World War (University of North Carolina Press), examines its mesmerizing appeal with scholarly thoroughness.

Mandate Days: British Lives in Palestine 1918-1948 (Douglas & McIntyre), by A.J. Sherman, is a fascinating and insightful account of a bygone era. Sherman, a skillful writer, looks at Palestine through the prism of the largely pro-Arab officials who governed the country before Israel's emergence as an independent state. Complemented by 61 black and white illustrations, this book is based on primary sources, and fills a yawning gap in what Sherman calls "one of the least glorious episodes" in British colonial history.

The Jewish State (University of California Press), written by American academic Alan Dowty, is a learned and lucid tour d'horizon of Israeli democracy. Dowty explores the wellsprings of Israel's political system and focuses on the challenges that lie ahead.

In the paperback edition of Rubber Bullets: Power and Conscience in Modern Israel (University of California Press), Yaron Ezrahi reflects on Israel's startling transformation from an embattled nation to a prosperous society trying to reconcile "the logic of military force in the pursuit of national liberation with the integrity of the original commitment to democracy." An intellectually bracing book.

Jerusalem's historiography has all too often been politically-motivated and self-serving. But in City of Stone (University of California Press), Meron Benvenisti, the former deputy mayor of Jerusalem, diverges from this well-worn path. A liberal, he describes the victories and defeats of all its residents and, in so doing, weaves an uncommonly complex tapestry of a city in transition.

Israel's peace treaties with Egypt, Jordan and the PLO notwithstanding, Arab-Israeli talks have often failed. Laura Zittrain Eisenberg and Neil Caplan, in Negotiating Arab-Israeli Peace (Indiana University Press), claim that "a pattern of negative behaviors" has historically stymied negotiators. Citing several case studies, from Israel's abortive 1983 peace pact with Lebanon to Israel's unsuccessful negotiations with the Palestinians in Washington from 1991 to 1993, the writers make their case.

In Crossing the Jordan: Rabin's Hard Road to Peace (St. Martin's Press), a seasoned Israeli journalist, Samuel Segev, spins a compelling tale of secret talks, back-channel bargaining and daring initiatives since the 1970s. Sometimes truth is stranger than fiction!

Israel's strategic relationship with the United States has been pivotal to its well-being. The 14 thoughtful essays in U.S.-Israeli Relations at the Crossroads (Frank Cass), edited by Gabriel Sheffer of the Hebrew University, enhance one's knowledge of the topic.

Through travail and adversity courageous men and women have risked their lives for Israel. Lionhearts: Heroes of Israel (Warner Books), edited by Michael Bar-Zohar, chronicles their exploits from 1897 to the present day. The 50 essays, nationalistic in tone, are by former Israeli presidents, premiers, parliamentarians, generals and scholars.

Lionhearts should be read in conjunction with Self-Portrait of a Hero: From the Letters of Jonathan Netanyahu, 1963-1976 (Warner Books), which was originally published in 1980, four years after his death during the Entebbe raid. The revised and updated edition contains eulogies from his brothers, Benjamin and Iddo Netanyahu.

More than 50,000 Ethiopian Jews have settled in Israel in the past 25 years. Shmuel Yilma, who made his way there in 1980 via Sudan, was one of the many. In From Falasha to Freedom (Gefen), Yilma, a poster boy for successful immigrant absorption, recounts his trip and tells of his personal triumphs in Israel.

David Aberbach, a McGill professor of Hebrew and comparative literature, offers a cogent analysis of Judaism through an examination of Hebrew writing. His book, Revolutionary Hebrew, Empire and Crisis (New York University Press), is thought-provoking. A companion volume, Hebrew Manuscripts at Cambridge University Library (Cambridge University Press), is also worth perusing.

Last but not least, consider One Hundred Years of Art in Israel (Westview Press), Gideon Ofrat's stunningly evocative survey, which is supplemented by 350 lavish illustrations.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Unfettering Judaism's wings

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

I often see powerful ideas that originated with Judaism appeal greatly to children once they are expressed in other forums.

Witness this example right out of contemporary culture. In the television series Star Trek: The Next Generation, an enormously popular program with children of all ages, there is a character named Lieutenant Warf who is not human, but comes from a race called the Klingons. The Klingons are a proud warrior-like people, who value traits such as duty and discipline; honor and inner strength; loyalty to a tradition — in short, many of the cornerstone values of Judaism.

In one episode, Warf is confronted by two fellow Klingons who want him to join them on a military expedition. He rejects their call to arms, and his answer to them exemplifies the concept of self-improvement that is so central to the Jewish philosophy of life.

The gist of his speech is as follows: "You look for battles in the wrong place. The true test is not without, it is within." (He points to his heart). "Here, here is where we meet the challenge. It is the weaknesses in here that one must overcome."

Now, had Lieutenant Warf consulted his Pirkei Avot, the ethics for living compiled by Jewish sages 2,000 years ago, he would have found a parallel statement at the beginning of Chapter 4: "Who is the strong man? – The one who conquers his evil inclination."

The very same kids who might be alienated from Judaism, who see it as a series of mechanistic and archaic rules and regulations, admire Lieutenant Warf's discipline, honesty and allegiance to an unbending code. I am not suggesting that Judaism be presented like science fiction. But what is clear is that religious education can succeed if we turn ourselves towards addressing children's imaginations and their deeply instinctive moral sense as well as engaging them with the idea of self-perfection. This is a start towards appreciation of Jewish wisdom and spirituality.

I once asked a congregant why he feels commandments are important; he replied that it is the will of God that we perform mitzvot. Beneath the slightly robotic feeling of this answer lies a deep religious truth. Any moral life that does not carry with it a feeling of unbreakable obligation to a higher authority, of the need to respond to a call outside of oneself, is inevitably doomed to narcissistic relativism. On the other hand, if Judaism is mere habit, answers without any questions, then it is reduced, in the poet's words, to a "paralyzed force/ gesture without motion."

Religious education must address the existential crisis of meaning that is symptomatic of life in the West today. To achieve this, our teachers have to be clear on the philosophical underpinnings and complexities of our religion. Do our schools, of all denominations and religious sensibilities, strive to convey to our children the spiritual depth of Judaism? Or do we offer instead a series of lists and facts, halachic minutiae and historical records, ethical exhortations without practical implications?

Translating religion into terms that a generation weaned on rock music and movies will still care about does not by necessity have to involve a dilution of the Jewish message. But it does mean having the courage to translate Torah into something more than simply tradition or ancient lore, and a lot more than the brief award-winning bar/bat mitzvah moment followed by spiritual oblivion.

Contemporary Jewry has been there, done that. It's time to unfetter Judaism's wings and let her fly.

Genealogical puzzles solved

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Peter Jassem's surname was always a puzzle to him as he grew up in a Polish home in Krakow. Jassem certainly wasn't a Polish name; neither was it Belarussian, Latvian or Ukrainian. His father said it may have come from the town of Jassy (Iasi) Romania but Peter wasn't convinced and suspected the truth even as a child.

Jassem, who came to Toronto 10 years ago, confirmed his long-held suspicions that he was descended from Jewish blood only 18 months ago. Conducting an Internet search, the 45-year-old architect found numerous Jassems in the United States and other countries, most of whom had originated in the same tiny region of Poland.

"All of a sudden I started contacting people who were positively Jewish, not half-Jewish, not formerly Jewish. That was basically the proof to the hypothesis that I had carried for years."

Jassem unfolds a huge sheet of paper, four feet by eight feet in size, and proudly displays an elaborate six-generational family tree. Since he began his genealogical research, he has corresponded with relatives on five continents and added 1,500 names to the tree.

"One of my greatest helpers in my research is my father. He's now going to the archives in Poland and sending me documents."

Jassem never knew until recently that his father's bar mitzvah had been scheduled for Sept. 4, 1939, the day the Germans invaded Krakow. Instead of celebrating, family members fled; most fell beneath the wheels of the Nazi juggernaut. Jassem's father, who survived with the aid of a false baptismal certificate, never returned to the Jewish fold.

Growing up, Jassem visited Auschwitz but never imagined that so many of his relatives had perished there. As an architectural student he made drawings and paintings of synagogues – "always from the outside."

He learned of one relative, a brother of his grandmother, who had survived the war by going to Turkey, then India, and who eventually wound up in Australia. Jassem traced a granddaughter of the great-uncle to Munich and discovered that she held a treasure trove of otherwise lost photographs of their extended family.

Jassem has collected enough family stories that he intends to write a book. He is determined to continue his research, since the links between many of the Jassems he has discovered are still unclear. "My hypothesis is that if people share the same unique name and come from the same small area, they must be related," he says. "I'm sure if I had information just one or two more generations back, I could solve many mysteries."

Recently Eric Greenberg, a reporter with the New York Jewish Week, telephoned Arlene Rich, president of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Cleveland, with an urgent question. "He wanted to know: 'Was Max Linder Jewish?'" Rich relates. "I think we had only one hour to deadline."

First, Rich checked her society's transcriptions of burials at Mayfield Cemetery, a Jewish burial ground, and found Linder's name. Second, she scanned the old Jewish Society Book, which told her that the one-time department store owner had been a member of The Temple, a prominent synagogue. Third, she called Probate Court and found a record of Linder's 1910 marriage to Stella Dryfoos, which had been performed by a rabbi named Moses Gries.

Still within the same hour, Rich spoke with several members of the Dryfoos family, a large and noteworthy Jewish clan in Cleveland and Fremont, Ohio, and confirmed that the Linders had a daughter, Louise, in 1911. She also found an entry for Max Linder's sister, Belle Israels Moskowitz, in the 1928 edition of Who's Who in American Jewry.

When the hour was up, Rich relayed the results of her research to Greenberg. "I basically told him, 'Go, man, go,'" she recalls.

That was all Greenberg needed to hear. The next Jewish Week conveyed the interesting information that Linda McCartney, the recently deceased wife of Beatle Paul McCartney, had been Jewish. A victim of breast cancer, Linda was the daughter of Louise Linder of Cleveland and Lee Eastman, previously Epstein, of Rochester, N.Y.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

A tragic inner world

The Iron Tracks*, by Aharon Appelfeld (Random House, $28.95).

Aharon Appelfeld is among Israel's best known and highly regarded authors. He takes his honored place with such older fellow-writers as Yehuda Amichai, A.B. Yehoshua and Amos Oz. At 66, he is read and appreciated worldwide, and his books have been translated into 27 languages. The Iron Tracks is his 11th novel to be translated into English; there are others to come.

Despite his reputation as a delineator of the Holocaust experience, Appelfeld has written stories about Jewish life in eastern Europe 70 or 80 years ago, and has produced three novels on the lives of Jews living in the Middle Ages.

As a child of eight, the author was deported from his home in Czernowicz to a concentration camp where he witnessed the murder of his mother. He escaped from the camp, wandered in nearby forests and when the war ended, joined the Soviet army as a kitchen boy. In 1946, he made his way to Palestine and after a period of 26 years, was reunited with his father. Neither knew that the other had survived.

No stranger to violence or privation, Appelfeld saw service in the Sinai Campaign, the Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War. By the time he was 40, he had become an officer in charge of culture. His responsibility was to teach soldiers a variety of subjects, including history, philosophy and literature, often out in the desert.

"To give a lecture on Maimonides," he remembers, "to troops who are about to go into combat was a very moving experience."

The Iron Tracks, like most of Appelfeld's novels, is brief and stark in its seeming simplicity. The protagonist of this unusual account, Erwin Spegelbaum, is a Holocaust survivor. The story takes place in the 1950s in Austria. Spegelbaum travels by train through small towns and villages in search of Jewish ceremonial objects – kiddush cups, menorahs, Hebrew and Yiddish books – objects that have survived their vanished owners, which he then sells to eager collectors.

Every year, symbolically, his journey starts and ends at the station where he and a group of survivors were locked into a train, just before liberation. But his real purpose in making this annual circuit of Austrian towns is to find and assassinate a brutal Nazi who was in charge of the labor camp where his mother was murdered.

When he finally closes in on his prey he agonizes over whether he has the courage to kill Nachtigel, the evil one. The eventual encounter between the two, the conclusion of his quest for revenge, is muted and strangely unemotional. The once proud Nazi is old and sad.

"At that moment it was hard to imagine that the man had once worn a uniform, shouted orders, abused people and shot them the way you shoot stray dogs."

More of Israel at 50

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Israel is 50. Do you need a better reason to teach your computer how to read Hebrew?

There are many wonderful Hebrew language sites on the Internet and you can enjoy them if you invest a few minutes to make your browser Hebrew-friendly. Below, you'll find some sites that will walk you through loading Hebrew, step by step. First though, some of the places you can visit, b'Ivrit.

There were 37 signatories to Israel's Declaration of Independence. Now is your chance to add your name alongside David Ben-Gurion's and Golda Myerson's [http://www.giga.co.il/atsmaut/]. At this site, you'll find a duplicate of the original written on parchment along with a more legible Hebrew copy. An English one is over at the Israel Foreign Ministry [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/peace/independ.html]. Eventually, a list of all the new signatories to the declaration will be presented to President Ezer Weizman.

While most of the country is celebrating its 50th, the Knesset is a young 49. Did you know that Israel's Knesset met in six locations (including the Kessem Cinema in Tel Aviv) before the current Knesset building was opened in 1966? [http://www.knesset.gov.il/knesset/] Although it's not quite like being there, you can take a virtual tour of the Knesset [http://www.knesset.gov.il/knesset/tour/heb_tour.htm] and even download QuickTime movies of the building's various rooms.

You (or your browser) don't have to speak Hebrew to enjoy Album 50. The site was put together by the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport [http://www.education.gov.il/edu/album3.htm] and it traces the country's history in pictures. Or you can focus on 50 years of settling the Negev [http://www.negev180.k12.il/m-meida/negev50/]. As for Israel's symbols, you can read about Hatikvah's roots in Romania in 1878 [http://www.geocities.com/CollegePark/Classroom/5095/hymnon.htm] and about the controversy that led to creating Israel's national flag [http://www.cet.ac.il/history/semel/].

Finally, don't miss Yaeli's Israel at 50 site [http://www.geocities.com/CollegePark/Classroom/5095/]. The history is interesting, there's a great anniversary links page, a quiz and even a countdown clock to Israel's 51st anniversary!

If you want to visit these sites, then it's time to teach your Internet browser how to read Hebrew. But first, a bit of background about languages and the Internet.

When you type the letter "a" on your computer and send it off on the Internet, every other computer will recognize your "a" because of worldwide standards. Every font has room for upper- and lower-case letters, numbers, punctuation and even some specialized characters like á, ì and õ.

But what happens if you want to read the letter aleph on the Internet? Most of us really don't need fonts with characters like á, ì and õ. So new fonts have been created in which rarely used characters have been replaced by the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. When a Web page is created using this font and a similar one is installed on your computer, you will be able to read Hebrew on the Jewish Highway.

There are many pages with instructions about downloading and installing bilingual Hebrew/English fonts (Windows or Macintosh) for your browser (Netscape or Internet Explorer.) Unfortunately, many of them are incomprehensible. Here are some with clearer instructions: Worldindex [http://www.worldindex.com/go/hebrew], SABRAnet [http://www.sabra.net/hebrewfonts.html], Dapey Reshet [http://dapey.reshet.co.il/help/2067.htm], the Hebrew University's Snunit [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/heb.html] and Thornhill, Ontario's Avrom Finklestein [http://www.geocities.com/TimesSquare/2923/] who offers some Macintosh fonts for the Web which I haven't seen anywhere else. You will come across several fonts that will work with your computer. Download them, install them and then choose the one that you find easiest to read on your screen and when printed out.

Jewish Life

Guest Voices

By CAROL SEVITT

Yad BeYad, now in its seventh year, brings Canadians and Americans to various locations in Israel to teach two-week sessions of conversational English to Russian immigrants. This is a memorable experience that rewards the volunteers as much as their students.

Marilyn Jacobs, a former elementary school teacher, went on the program a year after she became a widow. "I felt it would be a good way of travelling on my own for the first time," she said. "Not only did I learn that I could take care of myself, I had a wonderful time and made lasting friendships."

Jacobs was very impressed with the calibre of her Russian students. "There were engineers, scientists and doctors who were all working in their professions."

For Jacobs, living in Jerusalem for two weeks was very exciting. "Because you only teach three hours a day, from 5:30 p.m. to 8:30 p.m., you have plenty of time for sightseeing, shopping and going out with the other volunteers. I got a real taste of life in Jerusalem and saw all the important sites," she said.

Philip Covshoff, a businessman with no teaching background, said it's not necessary to be a teacher to do this program.

"I enjoyed stretching myself to meet the challenge of teaching a three-hour conversational English class. I viewed my students as 15 new friends; in fact, I still correspond with some of them by e-mail," he said.

Because teachers in Russia are quite formal, Covshoff said his students were a bit taken aback by his casual, friendly manner and his classroom attire – shorts and T-shirts. They quickly adapted to this informal atmosphere and eagerly questioned him about Canada, his family, his work and his home. He enjoyed it so much the first time, that he went a second time, and is now coordinating this year's program.

"It's a lot of fun and a bit like adult summer camp," he said.

To make Yad BeYad volunteers feel welcome, they can be paired up with host families for Shabbat dinner. One of the highlights of Covshoff's trip was having Shabbat dinner at the home of David and Esther Bar Tov.

"David Bar Tov had been chargé d'affaires in Moscow in the late 1980s and early 1990s when there was an active transfer of Russian immigrants out of Russia. I was fortunate to meet this impressive couple and hear their fascinating stories about the Russian exodus," said Covshoff.

Another volunteer, Sharyn Mandel, a director of her own preschool, said she appreciated teaching a beginner's class because of her work with preschoolers.

"I used a lot of movement and body language in communicating with my students. All my students had learned some English way back. I triggered their memories and they surprised themselves with the words they were able to retrieve – it was a question of confidence for a lot of the students," said Mandel.

Her students were so eager to talk that they always arrived early and didn't want a break. She found the experience exhilarating and memorable. "I couldn't sleep for two weeks, I was so excited."

On the last night, her students put on a surprise talent show, which she found extremely moving. "One of my students couldn't even say his name on the first night and was reciting a poem by Keats after only 10 sessions of English class. Others sang songs or told jokes in English – they were amazing! It was quite an ending to a very special two weeks," she said.

Yad BeYad volunteers pay their own way, but costs are reasonable. Locations include Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Ra'ananah and Tiberius, and volunteers stay in hotels or bed and breakfasts.

"Our volunteers range in age from 24 to 68 and come from all walks of life," said Covshoff.

Training is provided prior to departure by people who have themselves been on the program. Volunteers are sent to Israel with many excellent ideas for activities, an ESL book and a handbook of teaching materials.

Yad BeYad runs July 1 to 19 or July 15 to Aug. 2, and includes a three-day mini-tour of Israel. Classes are held five days a week.

For further information, please contact Covshoff at 416-633-3531 or Elaine at 416-635-5157.

But there is catharsis for both protagonist and reader – and the echoes of the event resonate in both mind and memory.

A disconcerting aspect of the story concerns the diverse non-Jews Spegelbaum meets on trains. They are uniformly and unapologetically anti-Semitic, and the Jews – total or partial – are furtive and broken in spirit.

Some years ago, the author wrote: "I think that the Jewish experience in the 20th century is, in all its manifestations, probably the deepest experience that human beings have had. I don't mean only the Holocaust. I am talking about all Jewish experience, religious, secularized, socialist, anarchic, liberal, nationalist. All the travels, all the illnesses, all the devotion. The range of this experience is a wonderful thing. It is what makes me so happy to be a Jew."

This sense of joy is not evident in this novel, but rather the tragic, complex, wrenching inner world of a survivor with a resolute mission.

Community Matters

UJA Federation

Mobilizing Volunteers for Campaign '99

Even though the launch of UJA Federation's 1999 campaign is more than three months away, efforts to build a strong team of campaigners are already underway to help make the last campaign of the millennium the most successful yet.

Axmith, who has campaigned at dozens of UJA Federation telethons, places a high premium on educating both donors and volunteers.

"We're asking our veteran campaigners to return," explains 1999 Campaign Recruitment Chair Marlene Axmith, "but we're also counting on attracting new people."

The 1999 campaign will be similar to UJA Federation's highly successful Three Year Vision campaign, initiated in 1996 under the chairmanship of Carol Kassel and Charles Gold. During that Three Year Vision campaign, more than 8,000 donors made pledge commitments for the 1996, 1997 and 1998 campaigns, allowing campaigners to focus more time on reaching out to new contributors.

"Now that we're beginning a new three year cycle, we have these 8,000 additional donors to contact," explains Axmith. "If we're going to raise enough funds to meet the community's current and future needs, we're going to need a strong corps of educated and dedicated volunteers."

Plans to recruit campaigners include matching veteran campaigners with novices, re-establishing contact with former campaigners through personalized letters and appointing volunteer recruitment coordinators in all UJA Federation division campaigns. Past Chairman's advisory groups have also been set up to provide expertise and advice to campaign leadership.

By the year 2001, UJA Federation aims to raise its annual campaign total to $50 million in order to meet its new funding agenda devoted to strengthening Jewish identity, protecting the vulnerable, and the ongoing rescue of Jews from unstable regions.

Volunteer Views

Ida Churney is a familiar face around the halls of North York General Hospital. Ironically, the retiree's frequent visits to the medical facility have more to do with the health of others than with her own.

Churney, who's been a Jewish Family and Child Service Chaplaincy Services volunteer for nearly ten years, visits Jewish patients at North York General to do what she can to lift their spirits and make them feel less alone.

"It's amazing how a personal visit from a volunteer can make someone feel better, even if it's just for a little while," explains Churney. "For some, it's the best kind of therapy they can receive and they're response is always heartwarming."

Churney, who can drop in on as many as 25 patients during an afternoon visit, is one of 150 Chaplaincy Services volunteers who stop by to check on thousands of community members in hospitals, nursing homes, prisons, mental health facilities and other institutions. In just six months, Chaplaincy volunteers make more than 800 visitations, most to the elderly and the sick.

"The majority of people I see are seniors who feel frightened, confused and sad," explains Churney. "I offer them whatever comfort I can, whether it be making them aware of how they can get kosher meals or providing them with prayer booklets during the holidays."

Churney proudly displays a gold Magen David on a chain around her neck so patients will feel a Jewish connection during the visit. "I want them to know the community has not forgotten them," says Churney. "It's a mitzva."

Bringing Joy to Seniors

UJA Federation's Hands On Toronto Young Leadership Program is helping make Jewish holidays and celebrations more meaningful for hundreds of seniors.

Recently, 15 members of the group of young adult volunteers helped nearly 200 seniors, mostly from nursing homes, participate in a community Seder at Temple Sinai. HOT volunteers helped seniors as they arrived, escorted them to their seats and encouraged them to partake in the singing and dancing throughout the program, which was co-sponsored by Temple Sinai Youth and Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS).

"Getting older people in and out of cars, removing their coats and getting them settled in their seats is a big job," explains Toby Maskowitz, co-ordinator of JF&CS Chaplaincy Services. "Our volunteers made things much easier and enjoyable for the seniors and also added a lot of spirit to the festivities."

"We were all very happy to share the holidays with these special members of the community," says Lori Winch, who chairs the division of HOT that concentrates on nursing home visits. "Many of the seniors were very emotional and thankful that we were there," adds Winch.

More than 60 HOT volunteers, aged 23-39, are active in a variety of hands on projects designed to provide direct assistance to those in need. Other areas of programming include Shabbat dinners, Jewish Big Brothers and Big Sisters, entrepreneurial assistance seminars and assistance to JF&CS clients, such as house painting and cleaning. HOT's latest initiative encourages Jewish youth to become active in social and political issues pertaining to the Jewish community.

HOT's nursing home visitation team also recently helped seniors at Bayview Extendacare nursing home celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary. "It meant so much to them that we helped make them a part of this historic occasion," says Winch.

Blind lawyer pushes for accessibility legislation

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — David Lepofsky finds it intriguing that while the Israeli Knesset has managed to pass legislation on accessibility for the disabled at a time when the country is dealing with peace negotiations and terrorism, booming Ontario is still dragging its feet.

Lepofsky is co-chair of the Ontarians with Disabilities Act Committee, which is putting pressure on the Ontario government to pass a law requiring public services, places and institutions to be accessible by the disabled. He also played a role in the events leading up to the passing of legislation by Israel's Knesset in February ensuring equal rights for people with disabilities.

Lepofsky, a Toronto lawyer who is blind, has volunteered for the past four summers at B'Zchut, the Israeli Centre for Human Rights for Persons with Disabilities. He is a board member of the New Israel Fund (NIF), which provides part of B'Zchut's funding.

On a 1994 visit, he became aware that Israel didn't have a comprehensive disability rights law, and that the existing laws were often disregarded, he said in a recent interview.

Contrary to popular belief and despite the large number of war wounded, Israel has been "a terrible place for people with disabilities," said Lepofsky. "It's extremely hard to get around in a wheelchair. People face incredible barriers in seeking employment, and even as a tourist, I ran into a number of barriers and impediments.

"It occurred to me that what they should do was to get a disability rights law passed."

He pitched the idea to a small group that included American law professor and disability rights specialist Arlene Kanter (whom Lepofsky had met on an NIF day-tour in 1993) and lawyer Tzvia Admon, who worked for B'Zchut at the time.

Lepofsky's ideas became the impetus for a private member's bill introduced by MK Dedi Tzuker in the Knesset.

Although he gave input along the way and met last summer with Justice Minister Tzachi Hanegbi, Lepofsky emphasized that it was the people in Israel "who fought the fight. I don't want to give any other impression. I don't for a moment claim credit, nor am I a lead player."

Although the law has not been passed in its entirety, the parts that have not been passed are under consideration, said Lepofsky.

Because of the great influx of Russian immigrants to Israel in recent years, there was a proportionate increase in housing construction. Had legislation been in effect earlier, Israel could have had the world's highest proportion of accessible housing at virtually no added cost, Lepofsky said.

"There was no law to require them to make sure [the housing] had accessible units. If you're building a lobby anyway, do you have to put in steps?"

Lepofsky has been involved with similar events in Israel and Ontario at the same time. The coalition he co-chairs is putting pressure on Ontario Premier Mike Harris to fulfil an election promise to pass accessibility legislation.

"The mythology is things are getting better, and in some areas they are, but in many areas things are getting worse."

In an era of budget cuts, Lepofsky noted, "you need disability legislation to prevent us from suffering even more than everyone else, which, by the way, is a comparable issue in Israel because of downsizing."

TORONTO — Pnina Zilberman has resigned as director of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto to become a consultant to organizers of heritage travel trips to eastern Europe and to authors and film producers working on Holocaust subjects.

Having guided the Holocaust centre through a period of explosive growth since 1989, Zilberman said she hopes the centre will continue to expand and serve as an important part of the Jewish community.

During her time as director, she developed Holocaust Education Week, which covers a diverse range of topics and has become the only project of its kind in the world.

The centre is being reorganized and there are no plans to appoint a director to replace her, said Zilberman, a former day school teacher who has been active in the community for 30 years.

Recently returned from leading a group of adults to Poland and Israel in the March of the Living as part of her former position, she leaves May 5 as a travel consultant with a group going to Prague, Vienna and Budapest for 12 days.

She will then go to Romania where she hopes to visit the birthplace of her parents in what was then Bukovina.

"Discovering our roots is important, not only for teenagers, but for adults," said Zilberman, who is the daughter of Holocaust survivors.

She wants to create personalized trips for those seeking their roots in Poland, the former Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria and other countries.

She is already working on two films, one based on the experiences of survivors in Transnistria (in Ukraine), and she is a literary consultant for Winnipeg author Carol Matas.

Her main concern in working with authors and other artists is to ensure that their material on the Holocaust, Judaism or Israel is authentic.

"We know that there are deniers waiting around the corner to pounce on anything that is not authentic," she said.

Group wants Jews to live up to tikkun olam

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The object of Ve'ahavta, says its blunt-spoken executive vice-president, Avrum Rosensweig, is to get Jews to put their money, or labor, where their mouths are.

It's time, Rosensweig says, for the Jewish community to live up to its commitments to tikkun olam (repair of the world) and chesed (kindness) by doing more than attending meetings or signing petitions.

That's why he and Stephen Epstein founded Ve'ahavta (The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee) late last year. The group, whose name is taken from the mishnaic injunction to love the stranger as oneself, has as its ambitious goal the alleviation of suffering around the world.

It will do that by raising funds and awareness, but also by dispatching teams of Jewish doctors, nurses and other health care professionals – a "Jewish service corps" – to countries whose populations are threatened by disease.

It also hopes to address natural disasters by raising money or, if needed, also sending "crisis response teams" of relief workers.

It's all designed, says Rosensweig, to reawaken the traditional Jewish commitment to social activism and the alleviation of suffering, no matter where it occurs and no matter what religion the victims are.

Inaugural mission to Guyana

Ve'ahavta recently held its official launch, at which its inaugural mission, to Guyana in February and March, was described by team leader Dr. Michael Silverman, head of infectious diseases for Durham Region.

The team spent two weeks in the South American country, bringing drugs that are cheap and plentiful in North America "to a place where no one can get them," Silverman said.

Even something as innocuous as children's vitamins probably saved lives in Guyana, he noted.

The drugs the team took were donated by Apotex and Novopharm – both Jewish-owned – and by pharmacist Norm Stern, who's active in the Jewish community.

That's also one of Ve'ahavta's intentions: to get Jewish health professionals to donate goods and supplies.

Guyanese adults and children lined up by the hundreds for vitamins, mite-killing shampoo and medicines, said Silverman, who gave a moving slide presentation of the mission. Many people came from deep inside the jungles after word spread quickly that relief was available. The team was repaid with hugs and even songs, Silverman recounted, and their presence was widely reported in local media.

"We left feeling fulfilled," he said. "We had done something."

Ve'ahavta also hopes to share in relief projects with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. But the more immediate task at hand is to raise funds in the community.

The organization hopes to raise $225,000 in its first year of operation, to be boosted to $375,000 in its second year. Money will come from endowments, government grants and traditional fundraising.

Ve'ahavta is scheduling its next mission to Zimbabwe, which reportedly has the world's highest rate of infant HIV.

"After the Holocaust, we said 'Never again.'" Rosensweig stated. "Now, the rest of the world is asking, 'Where are we?'

"We'll be around as long as the world needs us."

On this 50th anniversary, thousands of Israelis hope your name will be right next to theirs.

Signing Anew: A Statement of Solidarity.

The State of Israel, the culmination of 2,000 years of Jewish longing for a homeland, is celebrating its first 50 years. In that time, it has become home to millions of our dispersed people from around the world, brought them an unprecedented measure of prosperity and security, and created the institutions of a modern democratic state.

As Israel enters its second half-century, hundreds of thousands of Israelis are signing anew their Declaration of Independence, through a campaign jointly sponsored by the New Israel Fund and Yediot Aharonot. They are reaffirming that, "The State of Israel will be open to Jewish immigration and the ingathering of the exiles. It will devote itself to developing the land for the good of all its inhabitants. It will be based on freedom, justice and peace as envisaged by the prophets of Israel. It will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex. It will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education, and culture..."

As Israelis are rededicating themselves to the State's founding principles, so do we Jews of the Diaspora reaffirm the historic ties and shared values that have bound us together.

WITH MY SIGNATURE BELOW, I PROUDLY EXPRESS MY SOLIDARITY WITH ISRAEL'S FOUNDING VISION, AS EMBODIED IN ITS DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

This document will be presented to the President of Israel along with the signatures of hundreds of thousands of Israelis.

Scottish-born Bible scholar will deliver Rosenberg lecture

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Avivah Gottlieb Zornberg

TORONTO — A lifelong love of words led Avivah Gottlieb Zornberg to pursue a PhD in English literature at Cambridge University, but for the past 18 years the Jerusalem-based lecturer has been unlocking the mysteries of Jewish texts for a wide variety of students.

Interpreting literature and interpreting the Bible are "close, but there is something additional in dealing with the Bible, a sense of spiritual depth and richness," Zornberg told The CJN by phone from her home in Jerusalem.

The Scottish-born scholar and author of Genesis: The Beginning of Desire will give the Rabbi Stuart and Hadassah Rosenberg Memorial Lecture on Encountering G-d in Unplanned Moments: Insights from the Book of Genesis, at Beth Tzedec Congregation on May 21.

Toronto, will be her only Canadian stop on a month-long North American speaking tour. Her husband Eric, who is from Montreal, has family here.

Zornberg has been acclaimed for the eclectic array of sources from which she draws her insights — everything from Kafka to Coleridge to Oliver Sacks, as well as traditional rabbinic writings and ideas she has picked up from students.

"I try to create a kind of tapestry," she said in a soft lilt still reminiscent of her native Glasgow, where her father, Dr. Wolf Gottlieb, was chief rabbi.

"I use Jewish sources and general sources, literary, psychological and philosophical [ones], and I'll try to weave them together to make a pattern that seems to me to be significant. When it works well, there's something quite exciting about it."

"People are looking to understand themselves and these sources offer extraordinary ways of approaching human problems. Women particularly are looking for ways of understanding their role in the world and as human beings... I've known women who've given up their careers to spend all their time studying Jewish texts."

Zornberg, a mother of three, spends about half her time preparing for the classes she teaches at institutions like Pardes, Midreshet Lindenbaum, Matan and the Jerusalem College for Adults. She lectures on tour once or twice a year.

After she made aliyah in 1969, Zornberg taught English literature at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem until 1976. "I wasn't altogether happy with the general tendency of academia," she said of her decision to change paths. She finds her work now both engrossing and stimulating, she said.

Zornberg attributes an increased interest among non-Orthodox Jews in the so-called Jewish bookshelf, to the "joy and spiritual pleasure to be got from studying texts... and then it becomes an essential part of their lives."

Healing Project hosts conference

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Toronto Jewish Healing Project is sponsoring a conference for professionals and volunteers on Wednesday, May 27 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

The program, titled Healing and Holiness, will explore dimensions of healing from a Jewish perspective.

Etta Ginsberg McEwan, coordinator and one of the founders of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project, established in 1996, told The CJN that Judaism has an enormous amount to say about illness and spiritual healing.

The Toronto Jewish Healing Project, a volunteer organization, offers 8-week sessions led by a rabbi and a lay person. The group is not affiliated with any particular stream of Judaism.

The sessions help participants develop a deeper experience and understanding of feelings, thoughts, emotions and ideas through the study of sacred texts, music, rabbinic commentary, midrash, rituals and stories.

Workshops at the conference will include Jewish meditation; A spiritual tool for healing; caring and curing; Jewish responses to life crises; Chassidism and healing; the link between Jewish music and healing; content of a Jewish healing group; rabbis on healing; women in the Bible and healing traditions; and The mitzvah of bikkur cholim.

Rabbi Dow Marmur, another founder of the project, will chair the plenary session. Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation will conduct a "service of healing," and story-teller Rita Sue Fisher will present a program weaving together Jewish songs and stories.

Keynote speaker will be Dr. Vivian Rakoff, professor emeritus at the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry. Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Synagogue, will serve as moderator, with respondents Rabbi Frydman-Kohl and Dr. Mary Vachon of the Toronto Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre.

Guttmann a leading volunteer

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Max Guttmann, one of the Toronto Jewish community's busiest volunteers, died April 29 of complications from cancer. He was 65.

Obituary

Guttmann's name was synonymous with volunteerism in the city. He lent his efforts to many Jewish and non-Jewish organizations and causes, including United Jewish Appeal, Israel Bonds and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

Guttmann was a Holocaust survivor, and his story approached the miraculous: his entire family – both his parents and all nine of their children – survived the war.

Professionally, he was a tool and dye maker. The company he founded in 1969, Algood Casters, is now run by two of his three sons.

But it was helping others that drove him, said his son Craig, 34.

"He liked to ski. He had a regular poker game every Wednesday night. But he loved his charities," Craig said.

Guttmann helped found two local Orthodox synagogues: B'nai Torah Congregation in Willowdale, and Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation in Thornhill.

He was, however, a member of Beth Emeth Synagogue, which is Conservative. "He believed in helping all Jews," said his son Sean, 25.

He was also a prime mover within Reena, which helps integrate developmentally disabled adults into the general community.

A few years ago, when She'arim, the Jewish day school for children with learning problems, was in financial trouble, Guttmann quietly donated and raised enough money to keep it going.

"He gave a lot of help secretly," said Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth, who delivered the eulogy at Guttmann's funeral. "He was able to galvanize a lot of other people."

Guttmann was born in Usharod, Czechoslovakia in 1932, the fifth of nine children. The family moved to Budapest when he was three.

During the war, two of his sisters had Christian papers; five of the siblings were placed in Red Cross orphanages; and his mother, father and two brothers were hidden in a safe house by Swedish war hero Raoul Wallenberg.

According to his sister, Emma Eisner, there were several close calls, but the whole family survived the war.

Guttmann learned tool and dye making at an ORT school while in a DP camp in Germany. In 1949, most of the family, including Max, immigrated to Israel. They returned to Germany the following year, and on Yom Kippur 1951, Max, his parents and four siblings arrived in Canada.

Guttmann became the first Jew to be hired, as a tool and dye maker, at Massey-Harris, later Massey-Ferguson Ltd. He encountered anti-Semitism there, and once got into a fight. After the altercation, he was brought to the company president, who reassured Guttmann that he would be safe there.

A few years ago, Guttmann received a citation from the government of Ontario, which pays tribute to Holocaust survivors every year. He recounted the story of the fight to then lieutenant-governor Henry Jackman. It turned out that the company president who had reassured young Max was Jackman's father-in-law.

Guttmann and a partner struck out on their own in 1961, with A&G Dyes. He sold the company in 1968, and the following year, established Algood Casters, which manufactures casters for furniture and industrial uses.

He also helped Seneca College set up a program in tool and dye making.

Guttmann often hired people via referrals from Jewish Vocational Services. "He was always helping someone, always doing someone a favor," said Craig.

During the 1973 Yom Kippur War, he single-handedly raised $1 million in State of Israel Bonds, and hundreds of thousands of dollars for an emergency UJA drive.

Guttmann leaves his wife of 40 years, Sheila; sons Craig, Sean and Mark, 37, who lives in Israel; 12 grandchildren, and seven brothers and sisters.

Bouchard urges accommodation of Palestinians

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Amid generous praise for Israel, Premier Lucien Bouchard recently urged the country to accommodate Palestinian aspirations.

"The government of Israel acknowledges the responsibility to win the ultimate battle for peace and security that will offer equally to the Palestinians the possibility to live beside Israel, in dignity, as free men and women," Bouchard said in a carefully worded speech at a dinner in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary, organized by the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region (CIC-Q).

For most of the relatively short address delivered almost entirely in French, Bouchard expressed admiration for the determination, values and accomplishments of Israel, but his message that Israel must accommodate Palestinians was there between the lines.

He called the anniversary an occasion for both "sadness and elation," the celebration having been dampened by "so much lack of understanding, so many broken lives, so much accumulated hatred.

"I know how much Israelis yearn for peace, for a just peace that would allow all the peoples in the region to bid farewell to arms. Developments in recent years have given rise to a glorious hope, the hope of reconciliation between the sons of Abraham, of a world in which the two peoples would coexist, side by side, in which one of them would not necessarily take the other's place.

"This peace, however, that was thought to have been signed in Oslo, has not been without impediments. And history seems once again to be faltering. The Israelis have had something they didn't want – attacks, and the Palestinians have not had what they wanted – a state."

Bouchard continued: "I feel that my friendship towards Israel authorizes me to not hide my concerns. With courage and audacity, Israelis have been able to preserve Israel's existence. Today it is their duty to defend her essence."

Outside the Queen Elizabeth Hotel where the dinner took place, about 250 demonstrators, mainly from the Arab community, denounced Bouchard for taking part in a celebration of Israel's statehood, which they declared in large banners has been 50 years of "dispossession" of and "aggression" against Arabs.

Shouting "Shame Israel. Shame Bouchard," they waved placards accusing Israel of victimizing Palestinians, physically and politically. The group's newspaper advertising listed financial support from the Confederation of National Trade Unions and the Quebec Labor Federation, among others.

Security was heavy, with a phalanx of 30 police in riot gear guarding the hotel's entrance.

Referring to relations between Israel and Quebec, the premier underscored the friendship between "our two peoples" who are both "enamored with the same ideals of justice, freedom and progress." He said he intends to step up cultural relations, business missions, academic exchanges and ministerial-level meetings between Quebec and Israel.

He also spoke warmly of his friendship with CIC-Q chair Thomas Hecht, who was the prime mover behind the dinner, held in cooperation with the Longueuil-based Orchestre Symphonique de la Monteregie.

He received a standing ovation from a large majority of the audience when he concluded.

A SENSORY EXPERIENCE

More than 700 people gathered at Associated Hebrew School's Danilack branch to celebrate Israel's 50th birthday. A cast of 100 children from grades 1-8 treated the audience to a medley of song and dance, an original theatrical production and over 100 displays.

Full house for Winnipeg bash...

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — "We were overwhelmed by the attendance," said Gerry Koffman, head of the Combined Jewish Appeal campaign and a member of the coordinating committee that organized the Winnipeg Jewish community's Israel at 50 Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

Over 2,000 people came out to the Convention Centre on April 30 to celebrate the anniversary. There were so many people that more than 300 latecomers had to be turned away.

"We felt badly about having to turn people away," Koffman said, "but we only rented half the large hall. We were one of the few communities that didn't have an admission charge. We felt strongly that there should be no financial impediment in the way of anyone who wanted to celebrate this milestone. The downside is that we had no idea how many people would turn up."

The evening featured combined choirs and dance troupes from all the Jewish and Hebrew programs both in the public school system and the Gray Academy. Also featured were the Chai Folk Ensemble and Finjan. There were no lengthy speeches, Koffman said. "We wanted the evening to be freilech," he said.

The organizing committee did, however, honor Winnipeg machalniks – only Toronto's Jewish community sent more of its sons and daughters than Winnipeg to fight for Israel's independence in 1948 – as well as Israelis living in Winnipeg who fought in the War of Independence.

"We wanted to make the historic link," Koffman said. "We also showed part of a satellite link-up with the celebrations in Jerusalem through the good graces of [the Asper-owned] Canwest Global."

Koffman noted that all segments of the community were represented including a number of Israelis living here, members of the Russian Jewish community and virtually all of the Argentinian Jews who have settled in Winnipeg within the last two years.

...and 600 in Hamilton

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
Hamilton Correspondent.

HAMILTON — Over 600 people attended Israel's 50th anniversary celebration at Hamilton's Jewish Community Centre (JCC).

The facility's tennis bubble, decorated with blue and white helium balloons, was transformed to accommodate 60 tables and a dance floor.

The festivities began with the blowing of a shofar in honor of the jubilee year and an emotional singing of Hatikvah. As adults and children danced a horah together to the strains of touring Israeli duo Eddy and Maya, others lined up for a buffet style, traditional Middle Eastern meal prepared by volunteers.

The formal part of the festivities included a ceremonial procession of children bearing Israeli flags led by local veterans of Israel's wars, and brief speeches delivered by 50th anniversary celebrations chair Moishe Chaimovitz, JCC president Howard Brown, and Jewish Federation president Cheryl Greenbaum. Finally, children from the Hamilton Hebrew Academy performed a number of Israeli folkdances.

The remainder of the evening featured impromptu Middle Eastern and contemporary dancing.

TV treatment of Reichmanns

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The intriguing tale of the reclusive Reichmanns' rise to the status of one of the wealthiest families in the world and rapid fall is coming to the small screen.

Independent Montreal filmmaker Alan Handel is working on a two-hour documentary based largely on the book The Reichmanns: Family, Faith, Fortune and the Empire of Olympia & York by Anthony Bianco, a Canadian bestseller which recently won the National Business Book Award.

Handel has agreements with Global Television and TVA, the largest commercial French-language network, to broadcast the documentary in two one-hour episodes, possibly in the spring or fall of next year.

2,800 attend B.C. festivities

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — An excited audience filled every seat of the Orpheum Theatre for an exuberant celebration of Israel's 50th birthday.

Tickets were sold out two days before the event. A Time to Rejoice/ Israel at 50, which attracted 2,800 people. The admission price was kept low, to enable as many as possible to attend.

Coordinated by Beth Tikvah choirmaster Joan Freeman Cohen, A Time to Rejoice presented a pageant of Jewish history from biblical times to the founding of the State of Israel, accompanied by music and dance provided by community choirs and dance groups.

Adult choirs, conducted by Cantor Steve Levin, included the choirs of Beth Israel and Beth Tikvah synagogues, Har El Zimriyah, the Shiron Singers, and the Vancouver Jewish Folk Choir of the Peretz Institute.

Children's choirs conducted by Joan Freeman Cohen were from Beth Tikvah-Prozdor, Maimonides and TAG (Beth Israel and Temple Sholom) Jewish high schools; the Richmond Jewish Day School and Vancouver Talmud Torah; and the Beth Israel, Beth Tikvah, Har El, Or Shalom and Temple Sholom supplementary Jewish schools.

The grand finale was the performance by the entire ensemble, more than 300-strong, of Ayn Zo Aggadah (If you will it, it is no dream), an original piece with music and lyrics by Broadway actor and composer Andrew Lippa conducted by Maestro Sergiu Comissiona of the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra.

Hobson steps up campaign

Scene in Ottawa

By STEPHEN BINDMAN

OTTAWA — And the war crimes wars go on.

Not the courtroom battles against suspected Nazi collaborators living quietly among us – they continue at a pace unmatched since the end of World War II.

No – the unseemly fight between a former top Canadian Nazi hunter and his former colleagues in the federal Justice Department.

In this space a few weeks ago, I naively expressed the hope that an exhaustive report by a former Osgoode Hall law dean would finally put to an end efforts by Bill Hobson to prove there was anti-Semitism in the federal war crimes unit.

Wrong.

I was fearful that if Hobson persists in his anti-Semitism claims, there is a real danger he will be remembered not for his pioneering war crimes work in the Jacob Luitjens case (Luitjens was the first person to be stripped of his Canadian citizenship and deported for lying about his wartime activities), but his failure to move on.

Hobson has filed an application in Federal Court seeking to quash the 260-page report by law professor John McCamus.

The retired lawyer, who is representing himself, claims he was denied procedural fairness and natural justice in the way the inquiry was conducted and says McCamus's report was replete with "egregious errors."

He alleges McCamus was not independent and suggests the Justice Department "lost, misplaced or destroyed" many key documents related to his anti-Semitism allegations.

Hobson describes McCamus, who concluded he could not rely on the former prosecutor's recollections of events passed, as totally lacking in understanding of war crimes cases and "disoriented, totally unprepared" for their first meeting.

"I submit that by failing to apply principles of natural justice and procedural fairness, Mr. McCamus has produced a work of fiction analogous to a Sherlock Holmes novel utilizing a process of deduction that produces an inaccurate report of what actually transpired in the unit at the relevant times in question."

Hobson, who will speak next week in Ottawa to the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, also has a separate $1-million lawsuit against the department and several of his former colleagues for intentionally "inflicting nervous shock and mental suffering" on him and his family.

Federal lawyers have countered with their own motion, seeking to have Hobson's application thrown out of court as "improper and defective." That will be heard June 3.

And some of the key players have written letters to this newspaper, attacking the lukewarm reaction of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) to McCamus's report.

Peter Kremer, the former head of the war crimes unit who bore the brunt of Hobson's allegations, wrote to complain of lingering complaints that nothing of substance was accomplished during his tenure.

"I would suggest that there is no objective factual basis to question the dedication, commitment and contribution of the unit between 1990 and 1995 and I would urge the CJC to redirect their energies to supporting the program, instead of attacking it," his letter said.

Meanwhile, Jewish Justice Department lawyer Arnold Fradkin has made it clear that the issue of anti-Semitism only came to his attention years after his major battle began when colleagues reported statements they had heard but he hadn't.

Hobson alleged that Kremer questioned the objectivity and legal advice of Fradkin, undermined his reputation and forced him out of war crimes work, because he was Jewish.

"The battle I'd fought over the years, when I was in the unit and after I left, was that in my view cases hadn't been pursued with sufficient vigor and that my 'fire in the belly' and that of a few others had been mischaracterized by some people as a lack of objectivity or fanaticism or obsession with the Holocaust," said Fradkin, who has been hesitant to speak publicly because he is still with the department.

"It was the vigor that I and a few others brought that helped win the Luitjens case, which until a few months ago was the only successful Nazi war crimes trial since the end of World War II. My position was that when all things were considered, there was at least an appearance of anti-Semitism that existed which should be properly investigated."

If there is a positive side to this whole sorry spectacle, it is that the intrabureaucratic squabbling does not appear to have sidetracked the current members of the war crimes unit from the important task at hand.

With time rapidly running out before both the accused and the accusers pass on, here's a hope that all eyes will continue to be focused on the right direction.

Maybe this wish will come true.

U of T launches summer program at Hebrew U

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The University of Toronto's (U of T) Woodsworth College is inaugurating a summer program in Jerusalem.

Classes will be held at the main campus of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem situated on Mount Scopus.

Noah Meltz, principal of Woodsworth College, says the college's international programs now include Siena, Hong Kong, and Jerusalem.

In May 1997, a group from U of T, including then chancellor Rose Wolfe; Heather Munroe-Blum, vice-president of research and international relations; and Meltz, travelled to Israel to establish an Israeli branch of the U of T Alumni Association.

As a follow-up to that trip, Meltz and Alex Waugh, vice-principal of Woodsworth College, returned to Israel to meet with officials from the Hebrew University to work out details for a summer program in Jerusalem.

Meltz says that "students may use this opportunity to visit the Holy Land while taking a summer course. As an added bonus, students will be in Israel at an historically significant time."

Like the Siena and Hong Kong programs, the Jerusalem program offers U of T undergraduate degree credit courses relevant to the location. The three courses offered are taught in English.

One of the most exciting courses, says Meltz, will be field archaeology "where students will have the experience of a lifetime participating in a biblical archaeological dig. Archaeologists say that our students can perhaps unearth centuries old pottery vessels, figurines, a city gate and even large buildings."

He adds that students looking for a more traditional course will find Jerusalem a perfect location to study Introduction to the Middle East and Religions of the Holy Land.

"Studying in Jerusalem is the best of both worlds," says Meltz. "It is like taking a course in downtown Toronto but you are on the spot where what you are studying actually happened. I am extremely pleased about this initiative and particularly that it is beginning in the 50th anniversary year."

The three courses offered in the inaugural year will be taught by Amihai Mazar of the Hebrew University, and Marion Boulby and William Klassen of U of T. About 20 students are expected to participate in the Jerusalem program, most from the U of T with some from other Canadian Universities.

The program will be offered for six weeks from July 6 to August 13. Field archeology will be offered from June 28 to August 7.

Meltz, who will represent Woodsworth College in Israel, is completing a 7-year term as principal and is planning on making aliyah. After retirement he will assume the position of professor at the Academic College of Natanya, and will be associated with the Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies at the Hebrew University.

For more information on the program in Jerusalem, Siena or Hong Kong, call 978-8713, e-mail, [summer program@utoronto.ca] or visit their web site at [www.utoronto.ca/woods].

Conference on Canadian Jewish life

TORONTO — The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University together with the Chair of Quebec and Canadian Jewish Studies at Concordia University will be sponsoring a conference June 7 and 8 on the study of Canadian Jewry.

The conference, which is funded by a grant from Multiculturalism Canada, will also inaugurate York's J. Richard Shiff Chair for the Study of Canadian Jewry. The conference is being co-chaired by professors Joe Levy and Irving Abella.

At the conference, more than 60 papers will be presented by many of the country's leading scholars in Canadian Jewish studies on almost every aspect of Jewish life in Canada. Among the topics to be discussed are sports and culture; Holocaust survivors; Nazi war criminals; anti-Semitism; western Jewish settlement, Communists, Women's organizations; and changing gender roles. Speakers will also include scholars from the United States and Israel.

The plenary session, featuring York University professors Ramsay Cook and Abella, and Prof. Deborah Dash-Moore of Vassar College will focus on the status and future of Canadian Jewish studies. This panel, moderated by Prof. Ira Robinson of Concordia, will begin at 8 p.m. on June 7. A reception at 7 p.m., hosted by the Centre for Jewish Studies, is open to the community.

The continuing legacy of A.M. Klein

By BILL GLADSTONE

Part 2 of a three-part series on the Canadian Jewish literary scene.

Ask any Jewish writer in Canada to name some of his or her most important influences and before long the name of A.M. Klein is certain to arise.

In an unofficial survey of contemporary Canadian writers whose works explore Jewish themes or feature Jewish characters, The CJN found that almost all were quick to cite Klein as a major influence. There is also a network of literary critics and scholars across Canada who specialize in the Montreal poet 26 years after his death and almost half a century after he lapsed into a prolonged literary silence into which some read a deep allegorical meaning.

Two years after Klein died in 1972, Ottawa poet and professor Seymour Mayne convened a conference on Klein, whose various papers had been donated to the Public Archives in Ottawa. At the conference, a group of professors, writers and family members of the late poet agreed to form the A.M. Klein Research and Publication Committee, with the goal of producing a definitive edition of his work in about eight volumes, in association with the University of Toronto Press.

Besides poetry, which was Klein's forte, the envisioned series would include short stories, essays, journalistic editorials, letters, his one published novel and other material. (Klein was nothing if not eclectic; he even attempted to write a Broadway play.)

Last year, the U of T published the sixth volume in the series, A.M. Klein: Selected Poems, a popularly priced paperback edition. Klein's slim poetic novel, The Second Scroll, is currently in the final stages of production as the penultimate volume in the series, and the final volume, containing hitherto unpublished letters, is expected to be ready for publication about the year 2001.

The committee saved Klein's letters for last, having placed notices in several international Jewish newspapers in search of more of his correspondence. "He corresponded with many people all over the world," says Zailig Pollock, professor of literature at Trent University and co-editor of the Klein project.

Ironically, although Klein is the focus of what Pollock calls "the most ambitious literary project of its kind in Canada," he never achieved the level of popular fame of some Montreal Jewish writers who rose in his shadow, namely Irving Layton, Leonard Cohen and Mordecai Richler. Further, while Klein remains an enduring icon in Canadian Jewish letters, it is dubious whether his literary legend looms as large below the 49th parallel; it seems primarily a Canadian phenomenon.

"Almost all the Canadian Jewish writers have written about Klein in one way or another – that's how strong the influence was," says Michael Greenstein, a professor of literature and author of Third Solitudes, a study of Canadian Jewish literature.

"He didn't turn his back on the Yiddish culture – he swam against the stream," says Ryerson professor Adam Fuerstenberg, editor of the Canadian Jewish literary journal Parchment. "He refused to go with the majority of writers who wanted to jettison Yiddish culture. Mordecai Richler is a good example; Irving Layton too: his name was originally Kaganovitch. Basically, they just dropped their roots. But Klein did not. He tried to blend, to synthesize the Yiddish culture with the English language."

Whereas the typical protagonist of a Richler novel abandons his immigrant past in his quest for assimilation into the mainstream, Klein's writing celebrates Jewish values and is rich in Judaic allusions, especially relating to Torah and talmudic lore.

"Klein addressed central religious and philosophic aspects of Judaism, not just its social aspects," notes Toronto novelist Cary Fagan, who readily acknowledges that he himself, like many modern Canadian Jewish writers, addresses Jewish themes in a far more peripheral manner.

In attempting to express his Jewish cultural identity within the parameters of the Canadian experience, Klein was ahead of his time, many say, since his work seems to prefigure the multicultural literary climate of the 1990s.

"He wanted to address a Jewish public but also a broader public as well," says Pollock. "He was writing at a time when there weren't any Italian, Ukrainian, Spanish and other ethnic writers in Canada. In his day, the literature was dominated by people of English or Scottish descent. He was the first non-French, non-British writer to make an impact in the larger scene of Canadian literature."

Seeing Klein's life as a parable, some observers draw moral conclusions from the literary silence into which he lapsed during his last two decades. "He tried to be both an artist and somebody who is acceptable to the Jewish community, and that's not always an easy tension to resolve," says Toronto poet Ken Sherman. "He wasn't comfortable with the role of being an iconoclast or a rebel, like Layton or Cohen. He tried very hard to hold a position of responsibility in the Jewish community... He lapsed into total silence at the end, but he was still writing speeches for Samuel Bronfman; so that's the tragedy of A.M. Klein. It tells us that his desire to be of service, to fit into the Jewish community, was very strong. I don't think he could reconcile that with his life as a poet, since I believe that every poet is automatically at odds with society in some way."

Alberta-born writer Norman Ravvin, who now lives in Fredericton, first discovered Klein in high school, and continues to regard him as a strong influence. "I admire his range, his interest in Jewish history and in secular matters, his willingness to take on both contemporary and traditional subjects, always from a Jewish perspective. I think his personal predicament is touching in a real way: his descent into silence or some kind of madness – I'm not actually sure what it was – which was partly brought on by his feeling as a writer that he had not reached the audience he wanted to reach. I've always found his personal life a lesson in how difficult the writing life can be."

Klein won a Governor General's Award in 1948 for The Rocking Chair And Other Poems; appropriately enough, Robert and Charlotte Melançon, a husband and wife team, also won a Governor General's Award several years ago for their outstanding translation of those poems into French. The title poem deals with the situation of the Québécois as a cultural minority, which for Klein paralleled the struggle of the Jews to maintain their cultural identity.

The consummate Canadian, he also wrote about the plight of the natives. Variously described as a trailblazer, a founding father and a lion in Canadian Jewish literature, Klein's legacy endures in the halls and chambers of the grand Canadian Jewish literary edifice whose dimensions he helped to establish. With his highly poetic sensibility, and predilection for traditional Jewish values, he has done more than perhaps he could have realized to make it a very grand edifice indeed.

Part III: A roadmap of modern Canadian Jewish writing.

An extraordinary and peculiar novel

The eminent literary critic Northrop Frye called The Second Scroll "one of the most passionate and intense of all Canadian novels," and it is commonly considered the greatest novel of Jewish reawakening written in Canada.

In form it resembles the Pentateuch, with five main books and a patchwork of canonical appendages. Its story, which stretches from the Russian pogroms of 1917 to the emergence of the modern state of Israel, is presented as a rough metaphorical equivalent to the biblical saga that culminates with the children of Israel reaching the Promised Land. That lofty literary parallel informs even the title, The Second Scroll, and suggests that author A.M. Klein saw Israel's establishment in 1948 as the triumphant finale to an epic and horrendously costly quest.

As the U of T Press prepares a new edition of Klein's novel, which was first published in 1951, scholars are still of two minds about it. The story focuses on a Montreal journalist who wanders to Rome, Morocco and Israel in search of his uncle, Melech Davidson, a Holocaust survivor whose various peregrinations through secularism, existentialism, Bolshevism, renewed Judaism and Zionism seem in part archetypical of the Jewish people.

"It's not what comes to mind when you think of a novel, although it's in novel form," says Pollock. "Klein didn't have the gifts of a novelist. There are no great characters and situations. It's a poet's novel, better seen as an allegory and a quest."

Filled with allusions and images from the earlier scroll, The Second Scroll is a thorough testament to Klein's deep religious sensibility. It is also a relatively rare early attempt to deal with the Holocaust in fiction, says Norman Ravvin, a specialist in Holocaust fiction.

"It's definitely an early breakthrough treatment of the Holocaust in North American literature," Ravvin says. "He's writing about the fallout for Jews and the Holocaust long before other writers are willing to try it. He takes a religious tack, and I can't say that it satisfies me, but it's a model that writers have continued to be influenced by – connecting the catastrophe with a declaration of the state so there's a kind of triumphant completion to the awful events of the war."

Despite its peculiarities, many Canadian Jewish writers and readers profess a strong allegiance to The Second Scroll that borders on reverence. "If I was going to a desert island, for sure I'd take The Second Scroll with me," says Shel Krakofsky. "In fiction, it would be my number one choice."

U.S.-Israel talks characterized by acrimony

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The Israeli-Palestinian peace process appears to hinge on Israeli-American negotiations.

And those negotiations lately seem to have some of the acrimony that for more than a year has characterized talks involving the Israelis and Palestinians.

In one sign of that acrimony, Israeli officials blamed American pressure for the collapse of a meeting on the peace process planned for this week in Washington.

During a series of meetings in London, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright issued invitations to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to attend the meeting – but on condition that both sides accepted an American proposal to advance the deadlocked peace process.

With the Palestinians accepting the U.S. proposal, all eyes turned to Israel to see whether it, too, would acquiesce to the American ideas, which call on the Jewish state to redeploy from an additional 13 percent of the West Bank in exchange for Palestinian steps against terror.

But in the eyes of Israeli officials – and to a majority of the Israeli public, according to a poll – the invitation to Washington read like an ultimatum.

Netanyahu has repeatedly stated in recent days that he would not accept any dictates or conditions relating to the Washington meeting and that Israel alone would determine its security needs.

Netanyahu met with U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross over last weekend in an effort to see if any last-minute language could be worked out to enable the Washington meeting to proceed.

But those discussions – or negotiations – broke down, and Ross called off the summit Sunday.

Ross did not speak to reporters before leaving for Washington, but other U.S. officials said he would consult with President Bill Clinton and Albright about the possibility of rescheduling the summit later this month.

While the summit has been scrubbed for now, Netanyahu was still planing to come to the United States later this week to address the annual gatherings of the American Jewish Committee and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

He is also scheduled to lead the annual Israel Day parade in New York, slated for May 17.

Meanwhile, Palestinian officials, who also met with Ross during the weekend, blamed Netanyahu for not accepting the American plan. They reiterated warnings of the violence that would ensue if the peace process collapsed entirely.

For months, the Palestinians have been calling on the United States to adopt a more active role in the peace process. And now, some Israeli officials are complaining that their American partners have changed from mediators into active negotiators.

Another source of Israeli anger were comments made last week by First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton advocating a Palestinian state.

"I think it will be in the long-term interests of the Middle East for Palestine to be a state," she said via a satellite link-up with Israeli and Arab teenagers meeting in Switzerland.

U.S. officials were quick to state that her remarks did not reflect a change in the Clinton administration's policy that statehood is a matter to be negotiated by the Israelis and Palestinians.

But given the fact that she spoke at some length on the subject, some observers felt that her comments were not accidental.

Netanyahu also reportedly complained during the meeting that the United States was portraying him as an obstacle to peace.

"It's impossible for you to invite me to Washington under such conditions. That's public humiliation," the premier told Ross, according to the Israeli daily Ma'ariv, which added that Netanyahu pounded his desk during the conversation.

Along with the First Lady's comments on Palestinian statehood, another development was likely to give some Israeli officials pause: Bill Clinton last week addressed a Washington gathering of the Arab American Institute, where he became the first sitting president to address an Arab American group.

Was this a signal sent from Washington in the face of what it views as Israeli intransigence?

If so, then Netanyahu and others in his government may have to start contemplating the price of a complete breakdown in negotiations with the United States.

Police numbers concern Israel

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — New statistics showing a disturbing increase in the size of the Palestinian police were given to The CJN last week by David Bar-Illan, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's director of communication.

These most recent figures, which are shortly to be made public, are a continuation of the lists compiled by the Prime Minister's Office detailing the violations of the Oslo accords by the Palestinian Authority (PA).

The latest infringements are of great concern to Israel. The figures suggest that the PA is building up a massive militia, ostensibly called a police force, which could potentially be turned against Israel at very short notice.

The statistics, which were compiled from information supplied by the PA or other non-Israeli sources, underline the Netanyahu government's concern about the sincerity of the Palestinians' intention to make peace.

"There is a provision in the 1995 Interim Agreement, known as Oslo 2, that permits the Palestinians to deploy up to 24,000 policemen in Judea, Samaria and Gaza," said Bar-Illan. "In fact, the PA has deployed some 40,000 policemen, which exceeds the limit set in Oslo by 66 percent. We quote the figure of 40,000 because this was the figure used by PA Finance Minister Muhammad Nashashibi in March this year. However, we know for certain that the true figure is nearer to 50,000."

Even taking Nashashibi's figures, the Palestinian force is 60 percent larger than the 25,000-strong Israel police. In terms of the Palestinian population of 2.4 million, the Palestinian police represents one policeman for every 60 residents. By comparison, in Israel there is one policeman for every 236 residents.

"The figures have also to be looked at in the light of statistics published by Interpol, which compared the ratio of policemen per thousand residents in the PA, Israel and various European countries," said Bar-Illan. "For instance Switzerland has two policemen per thousand residents, Germany has 3.2, France has four, Israel 4.2 and Spain 4.5. One must wonder why the Palestinians need a veritable army of 16.7 policemen per thousand residents to maintain civilian law and order?"

Bar-Illan explained that the size of the Palestinian police force is another outward manifestation of the Palestinians' inability to move towards a genuine peace with Israel.

"It is the potential threat to our security that makes any redeployment a serious risk."

Mofaz chosen as new IDF chief of staff

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai officially announced last Sunday that he has chosen Deputy Chief of General Staff Maj.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz over Maj.-Gen. Matan Vilna'i to be the 16th IDF chief of general staff (CGS).

The cabinet was expected to approve the appointment of Mofaz, 50, this week.

Vilna'i, 54, is expected to retire.

The announcement marks the culmination of a highly criticized and drawn-out decision process, which many officers and politicians have said harmed the position of chief of staff and humiliated the two candidates.

Mordechai's office issued a statement saying the decision is supported by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and would be brought before the cabinet for approval, in accordance with the Basic Law: The Army, 1976.

At Sunday's cabinet meeting, Mordechai expressed great respect and appreciation for both Mofaz and Vilna'i. Netanyahu said that both candidates are worthy of the position, either in times of peace or war.

"Maj.-Gen. Mofaz is an excellent soldier and commander. He impressed me with the judgment, thoroughness, seriousness and responsibility that he has brought to every post," Netanyahu said.

The prime minister, who reportedly had favored Vilna'i, noted that he has known Vilna'i for many years and that he is one of the IDF's best officers.

"He has been, and is, one of the most outstanding soldiers in Israel's history," said Netanyahu. "In such a situation, where there are two capable, responsible and honest candidates for the same position, the deciding consideration is the preference and desire of the defence minister to work with one of them."

Following the meeting, both Mofaz and Vilna'i were summoned to the Prime Minister's Office, where Mordechai informed them of his choice. He then informed Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak, who asked to relay the decision to the general staff. Mofaz will take over from Shahak on July 9.

The choice of Mofaz was a heavy blow to Vilna'i, who many believe to be the better qualified candidate. Looking dejected, Vilna'i left the Prime Minister's Office Sunday afternoon and bitterly told Israel Radio that the decision to appoint Mofaz was made "many months ago."

Deputy Defence Minister Silvan Shalom, while claiming Mordechai had toiled over the decision for a long time and only made his decision Sunday morning, also criticized the drawn-out decision-making period, saying it harmed the IDF and invited political pressures.

Netanyahu reportedly yielded to Mordechai's choice, since the latter insisted he prefers to work with Mofaz over Vilna'i, the defence minister's peer and rival throughout their military careers.

Mordechai reportedly said he chose Mofaz because he feels they could work better together. The defence minister has said he would explain his decision once the appointment is approved.

Even before he takes over, the CGS-designate will have the unusual opportunity to make three key appointments to the general staff. These are his deputy, OC Northern Command and most likely OC Intelligence. More than half the general staff is expected to shift tasks in the coming year. All these appointments need the approval of the defense minister.

Liaison to Aussie families named

By GREER FAY CASHMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Bezeq chairman Izzy Tapoohi will represent the government as the liaison with the Australian families of the victims of last year's Maccabiah Games bridge collapse.

Livnat, who was accompanied by Tapoohi and by Labor MK Ofir Pines, said that both she and Pines would support a parliamentary inquiry into the disaster.

Stressing the public and moral responsibilities of Maccabiah officials, Livnat said that had she been in their position, she would have promptly resigned.

Livnat made it clear that any parliamentary commission would focus only on the moral issues and not on the legal ones.

Colin Elterman, father of teenage victim Sacha Elterman said the families were satisfied that there was finally going to be a Knesset inquiry.

"It's a moral issue, not a political issue," he reiterated several times in a telephone interview.

Sacha Elterman was visited by Livnat and Pines ; she will be undergoing her 17th operation for back and neck problems.

The families were pleased to be dealing with Tapoohi, who comes from Australia and is also close to the Israeli government, said Elterman.

He hopes to bring his daughter back to Israel in December, providing that she requires no further surgery.

Though bitter about the Maccabi World Union, which he termed "a rotten organization," Elterman said he has no axe to grind against Israel or Israelis.

The outpouring of Israeli concern for Sacha's welfare has been heartwarming, he said, and supportive faxes, letters and postcards continue to arrive.

Special training needed to master IDF's Merkava

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Correspondent

NEGEV DESERT — One of Israel's main tank training schools is located in the Negev Desert. Tomorrow's tank commanders come here for four months to learn how to manage the pride of Israel's armored corps, the Merkava tank.

The training ground is huge to allow the over 50-ton tank to move around and accurately pick off its practice targets, often more than a kilometre away.

When he has finished his course, the tank commander will not only have the responsibility for his crew, he will also have to be able to carry out any job on the tank in an emergency. Besides the commander, the crew consists of a driver, a gunnery officer and a combined communication and ammunitions officer.

The Merkava tanks used at the training school are manufactured and designed in Israel. The Merkava, which means chariot in English, is regarded by many experts as the finest all-round battle tank in the world, incorporating state-of-the-art technology to locate and lock onto its target, even if the target or the tank itself is on the move.

"The tanks we use here for training are the Merkava models 2B and 3B," says training school spokesperson Lieutenant Shai. "The configuration of the tank here is exactly the same as would be found in a battle situation; the only difference is a high-backed padded seat located behind the turret. This is where the instructor sits as the tank goes through its training routine."

The Merkava 1B was first used in the Israel Defence Force (IDF) in 1979. In 1982, the Merkava 2B entered service, and in 1990, the present 3B model with its 1,200 horse-power, U.S. manufactured, diesel engine was introduced. The tank has an automatic gearbox.

Shai speaks with obvious pride about the Merkava. "There was no doubt that in the early days there were shortcomings in the design and performance of the tank, but we learned quickly, particularly in Lebanon and the Yom Kippur War, and each new mark corrected the mistakes of the earlier model, as well as the mistakes in other makes of tanks.

"Today the tank fires 120-millimetre shells with extreme accuracy and improved fire power. Once a target has been acquired, the Merkava automatically holds on to its target even when the terrain is very undulating.

"The Merkava is one of the best armored tanks manufactured today. The potential weak spots in its armor have been effectively eliminated by experience gained in battle situations."

The latest Merkava incorporates a unique rear corridor, a second entrance at the rear of the tank that can be used to carry an injured soldier on a stretcher from a battle zone. Alternatively, an additional two or three soldiers can be taken on board near a confrontation zone to assist the tank's four-man crew in overcoming an enemy position.

"Today we are witnessing a basic exercise," explains Shai, as the rumble of three Merkava 2B tanks can be heard approaching in the distance. They cannot yet be seen; only billows of powdered sand give away the position of the advancing tanks.

"This is the first time these soldiers have been on a tank in the field and this follows many months of intensive classroom training," Shai says. "Today the tank crews have to reach a designated objective using basic fire-power skills."

About a kilometre from the first exercise, three of the latest marks of Merkavas are lined up waiting for their crews. One tank lost a segment from its track and the crew are replacing the damaged section. Here technology cannot help too much; brute force is needed to drive the steel link pin into the newly placed track segment. Each crew member takes turns wielding a 5-kilogram, long-handled mallet, as the new pin is forced home and then secured. The crews taking part in this exercise have more experience than the first group.

Seated in front of an imaginary battle plan etched into the sand, complete with undulations and landmarks, the crews listen carefully to a briefing by their training officers. Each crew member knows exactly what is expected of him. Finally the crews are asked to stand while the instructor gives them specific safety instructions, particularly about the handling of explosives.

Jewish community leaders, members of Congress, and administration officials" during his U.S. visit. He also will attend ceremonies marking Israel's 50th anniversary, Bazak said.

On the eve of the final Netanyahu-Ross meeting, Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa said in Cairo that all sides "must consider their respective positions and adopt the requisite behavior because a regrettable and dangerous crisis is in the offing in the Middle East."

He contended that the ball is in the American court and credited Arafat with having exposed Israel's true position by having agreed to accept the American's initial invitation to a summit.

PA negotiator Saeb Erekat said the PA will reject all compromise proposals by Netanyahu that give the Palestinians less than that offered in the Clinton administration plan – 13.1 percent of the West Bank transferred to full PA control.

He said this includes Israeli suggestions of creating new areas of authority in the territories.

"We say that the United States has to take a firm stand," Erekat said. "Netanyahu has made it clear to all that he won't negotiate."

Erekat said U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright told Arafat in London last week that Washington will not change its bridging proposals.

He said the White House has not yet scheduled a new date for the planned Arafat-Clinton-Netanyahu summit. Instead, U.S. officials will consider their next step to revive the stalled peace process, he said.

At the same time, PA officials said they are concerned by what they termed Netanyahu's efforts to recruit Congress to prevent Clinton administration pressure on Israel. The officials said Arafat has criticized congressional support of Israel and attempts to stop the White House from advancing the peace process.

Meanwhile, settlement leaders threatened to topple the government if any further withdrawals from the West Bank take place, charging that Israel would be comprising national security if it bowed to U.S. pressure.

Wobbling towards oblivion

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

With the Oslo peace process wobbling toward oblivion following the abject failure of British-sponsored talks in London two weeks ago, the United States played hardball last week.

Mideast Analysis

Attempting to coax Israel into making "hard decisions" concerning the further redeployment of its forces from the West Bank, the United States invited Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) to a summit in Washington on May 11 to launch permanent status negotiations on such contentious core matters as final borders, settlements, Palestinian refugees and the status of Jerusalem.

The PA accepted the invitation but Israel demurred. The Israeli government did not even discuss the issue at its weekly cabinet meeting on Sunday. Stymied by Israel's refusal, the United States extended the deadline by two weeks.

Israel had been given six days, or until May 10, to accept the American invitation on the basis of U.S. proposals euphemistically described as "ideas." But in reality, Israel has had a few months to grapple with the redeployment question.

In essence, the proposals – which draw on Israel's 1995 and 1997 interim agreements with the PA – call on Israel to make a phased 13 percent withdrawal from the West Bank over three months in exchange for additional Palestinian measures to combat terrorism. None of the projected three redeployments has been carried out so far.

Benjamin Netanyahu, Israel's prime minister, was neither keen about the deadline nor the suggested percentage. Beset by conflicting pressures from all sides, and claiming that Washington's unannounced plan would compromise Israel's security, he offered nine and perhaps 11 percent. All the while, his spokespersons argued that it was Israel's prerogative to determine the depth of the withdrawals.

Holding her ground in the face of Netanyahu's assertions not to bow to American "dictates," U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright delivered two bold messages. She declared that she would not "water down" the proposals, and she claimed that they do not jeopardize Israel's security.

And in a veiled threat that recalled previous American showdowns with Israel over territorial pullbacks, Albright said that the United States would have "to re-examine our approach to the peace process" if Netanyahu spurned the summit.

As the tension escalated, and as PA president Yasser Arafat watched the unfolding political drama from a distance, Israel and the United States engaged in a test of wills that is bound to intensify when Netanyahu goes to the United States this week to address Jewish organizations.

President Bill Clinton staunchly denies that he has presented Israel with an ultimatum and that he is trying to impose a diplomatic solution. In fact, Clinton was exerting none too subtle pressure on Netanyahu. Netanyahu has also come under pressure from American Vice-President Al Gore, U.S. special envoy Dennis Ross, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs Martin Indyk, Jordan's King Hussein, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, and European Union emissary Miguel Moratinos.

Netanyahu's claims that the American proposals are contrary to Israeli interests and do not stand up to scrutiny.

• With a 13 percent redeployment, Israel would be giving up some 40 percent of the West Bank, compared to the Palestinian demand of about 90 percent. The late Yitzhak Rabin was reportedly ready to relinquish 50 percent during the five-year interim period, which ends next May. At present, the PA is fully or partially in control of 27 percent.

• The American plan satisfies Netanyahu's desire to plunge into final status talks now rather than after the third redeployment. The Palestinians had insisted that the third withdrawal take place during the interim period.

• The phased redeployments are based on "reciprocity," and must be matched by concurrent PA measures to keep Hamas militants in check, to prevent incitement to violence and to fully amend the Palestinian national covenant.

Diva wins Eurovision

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel won the Eurovision Song Contest Saturday night with the song Diva sung by Dana International, beating out the United Kingdom and Malta in a close contest that was decided by the vote of the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

Israel scored 174 points to the UK's 167 and Malta's 166.

It was the third time that Israel has won the contest since it started competing in the event in 1973.

The two previous wins were in 1978 with the song Abani-bi sung by Yizhar Cohen, and 1979, when Hallelujah, sung by Gali Atari, took the top spot.

Diva lyrics were written by Yoav Ginai and the melody was composed by pop star Zvika Pik.

Following the win, Dana, waving an Israeli flag and wearing a feather-bedecked vest over her gown, sang an encore to the cheering crowd, and said: "I want to say thank you. See you next year in Israel."

JERUSALEM (May 4) — A strong force of Arabs today launched a renewed attack on Kfar Etzion, the strongest of a chain of colonies in the Hebron Hills, south of Jerusalem. The force, composed chiefly of Arab Legionnaires reinforced by a company of Iraqi troops and local Arab guerrillas, opened fire at dawn. Late reports stated that the Jews have repulsed the Arabs, despite the fact that the raiders were supported by armored cars, field guns and heavy machine guns.

Palestinian state in the making?

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As Israel celebrated its 50th anniversary, Yasser Arafat vowed that in a year the Palestinians would celebrate their own independence.

The chairman of the Palestinian Authority reiterated publicly that on May 4, 1999, the state of Palestine would be proclaimed – with or without Israel's consent.

In response, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu reiterated his warning that if the Palestinians declared independence unilaterally, Israel, too, would take one-sided measures – a veiled threat that it would annex disputed territories in the West Bank.

Amid the rhetoric stands the reality that time is running out on the Oslo process. According to the Israeli-Palestinian accords, a permanent-status agreement is supposed to be finalized by next May. What happens after that date if no agreement is reached has been a matter of dispute.

According to the Palestinians, they have the legal right to declare independence when the Oslo timetable expires.

But an Israeli attorney who was a key figure in negotiating the Oslo accords disagrees. Yoel Singer, former legal adviser to the Israeli delegation in the peace negotiations, pointed out that the Palestinians were ignoring a clause that states that no party would unilaterally introduce changes in the status quo in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Whether the Palestinians could and would declare an independent state without an agreement with Israel strikes emotions on both sides.

But at least one scholar said the question of Palestinian statehood is moot because the Palestine National Council had already declared independence in 1988.

"I don't see much of a difference between that declaration of independence, and a possible declaration next year, except for the fact that now they are here," said Barry Rubin, senior resident scholar at Bar-Ilan University's Begin/Sadat Centre for Strategic Studies.

Having established self-rule in most of the Gaza Strip and portions of the West Bank, a Palestinian state is, in fact, in the making. Even hard-liners in the Israeli cabinet, such as Ariel Sharon, believe that an independent Palestinian state is unavoidable.

The notion of a Palestinian state alongside the Jewish state strikes fear in the hearts of many Israelis, though an increasing number are resigned to accepting a such an entity. But, if it will happen, the Israeli government wants that to result from final status talks, which have not yet begun and, therefore, could continue beyond May 1999.

During a visit to Bonn last month, Arafat was told by German Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel that a unilateral declaration of independence could make the situation "more and more critical."

Rubin said such a move could be a public relations disaster because the "government of Israel could blame Arafat for having walked away" from Oslo, and that, therefore, "Israel has absolutely no obligation toward the Palestinians."

To some Israeli and Palestinian observers, however, Arafat's repeated pronouncements on statehood amount to posturing in the course of peace negotiations.

"I do not believe that Arafat's declaration that he would take a unilateral step was serious," said Sa'id Zeidani, dean of the faculty of arts at Bir Zeit University in the West Bank. "Arafat knows that Israel's reaction will be hard. The very least it would do would be to put a siege on the new state and impose economic sanctions against it."

Yair Hirschfeld, of Haifa University's Department of Middle Eastern Studies, said a unilateral Palestinian declaration of independence could still be avoided.

"Much depends on the progress in the peace talks," said Hirschfeld, who was one of the key academic figures in talks that led to the first Oslo accord. "If there is sufficient progress, Arafat may extend the interim period for a year or two and refrain from taking provocative measures."

The 401 Connection: Jewish Singles Registry Leads The Way In Toronto and Montreal

Are you single and still having trouble meeting other Jewish singles? If so, then it's time to take matters into your own hands and find out for yourself why the Jewish Singles Registry (JSR) has been responsible for bringing thousands of singles together. Dora Korzinstone founded the JSR in Montreal 12 years ago. Since then the concept has spread to many cities, including Toronto, where the JSR catapulted its way to be Toronto's largest Jewish dating service. "It's a fast, easy, and confidential way of meeting other Jewish singles", says Dora. Adds Rob Singer, the owner of the Toronto operation: "Both Montreal and Toronto operations are each averaging an engagement a month. It is still very exciting to get a phone call that a couple has decided to get married. When you really stop and think about it, they most probably would never have met each other if they hadn't joined the Jewish Singles Registry."

Indeed, the Registry's biggest asset is that the member decides who they would like to go out with. Detailed profiles including photographs, help the member choose whom they think they would be compatible with. Once a selection is made the Registry takes over and a phone call is made (usually that very same day) to invite the selected member in to see who wants to meet them. Registry staff are always on hand throughout the entire process to offer guidance, suggestions and feedback.

City Exchange

It takes less than an hour these days to travel between Montreal and Toronto. That is why many JSR members can take advantage of each other's large database of members. Already many relationships including marriages have developed between registrants of these two cities and that number continues to grow.

Jewish Continuity

While Jewish continuity remains a problem in today's society, decreasing the rate of intermarriage and assimilation is not an easy task. Nonetheless, the JSR continues to do its part. Each week, hundreds of phone numbers are exchanged and new relationships are established. The major challenge however, is to see that the Jewish community continues to grow in numbers. The JSR takes pride in the fact that over 100 children have been born to its alumni, thus increasing the Jewish population throughout Canada.

Contacting the JSR

If you want to meet other Jewish singles, it's not going to happen by itself. Here is your chance to take the initiative and do something about it. Contacting the JSR is as easy as picking up your phone and calling them right now. Both daytime and evening appointments are available. In Montreal call (514)-937-2049. The Toronto office can be reached by calling (416)-483-4151 or e-mailing jsreg@total.net. A JSR web site can also be accessed at www.total.net/~jsreg.

KISS BLIND DATING GOOD-BYE

The Jewish Singles Registry offers you an unlimited number of introductions, that you select from an extensive Bio/Photo/Voice library. It's a great way for you to connect with people you would normally never get a chance to meet. So if you are looking for an attractive, fun, and simple way to meet other Jewish Singles, call the Jewish Singles Registry today.

Dentistry With A Difference!

Everyone knows that smiles and looking great go together. The very act of smiling can strengthen your confidence and sense of vitality; more so, if you have fine looking teeth.

If you want healthy, attractive teeth, CEREC restorations may be for you. Though CEREC has been known since 1985, Dr. Cappell and Dr. Potash at Lawrence Square Dental are one of the few offices using this technique in Toronto.

Conventional tooth reconstruction, such as veneers, requires at least two or three appointments. Veneers are porcelain overlays affixed to the front of the teeth, which work much like press-on nails do. Conventional dentistry would involve uncomfortable impressions and two appointments at least one week apart. With CEREC, the porcelain veneers are made and cemented all in one sitting, allowing the patient to walk away with a beautiful smile the same day. The CEREC system works in the same way for crowns, inlays, onlays and replacing of mercury fillings and broken down white fillings.

Your tooth is prepared then scanned with an electronic camera that shows it on video. The restoration is designed from this three-dimensional scan, then precision milled from a porcelain block. Conserving as much of the original tooth as possible, the porcelain restoration is accurately fitted and bonded to your tooth at once.

This porcelain is almost as strong as natural dental enamel, the body's hardest material. It's ideal for the daily grinding of food. Heat or cold won't affect it; you'll enjoy your coffee or ice-cream with no sensitivity. And the porcelain is so smooth bacteria shouldn't penetrate it.

"We were actively searching for durability and bio-comparable alternatives to amalgams because our patients were demanding it! CEREC is merely a tool to provide in our opinion the best restorative material for our patients. Short term treatment for long term success!"

Branson may get 60 beds for temporary chronic care

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is an excellent chance that Branson Division of North York General Hospital (NYGH) will get 60 temporary, long-term care beds, Murray McKenzie, NYGH president, told The CJN.

The 60 beds will be added to Branson's facilities under the Ontario goverment's plan to spend $225 million for 1,700 temporary beds to ease overcrowding in hospitals, McKenzie said.

They will be located in the new patient wing, utilizing space that is now mostly empty. Some offices will also be relocated to a different area of the hospital.

"We will respond to the government's offer immediately. We need those beds," he said.

The Branson Division will continue to offer all its present services for another 2½ or three years during the transition period, McKenzie told a press conference held to mark the official transfer of Branson to NYGH on May 1.

During the transition period, a 40-month lease negotiated between NYGH and Advent Health Services (representing Seventh Day Adventists) for some of the site's land and buildings will apply.

Hospital planning expansion

McKenzie said a new lease will be negotiated when Branson's acute care services are transferred to Humber River Regional Hospital and York Central, leaving Branson as an ambulatory care centre.

Branson's emergency department will remain closed at night because of the shortage of emergency room nurses, "but we would like to reopen it at night when possible, in a couple of phases, to alleviate the pressure on beds," he said.

Advent Health Care hopes to establish long-term care beds and services at Branson, under an Ontario government plan to build 20,000 new beds over eight years.

"We hope to have a role on this site," Keith Juriansz, Branson Division chair said. "Branson Hospital has served the comunity for over 40 years and there is some sadness that this tradition is coming to an end."

NYGH is planning a major expansion of services at its Leslie and Sheppard site, including improving facilities in emergency and adding four more operating rooms. It also hopes to add 40 beds in its senior residence nursing home under the government's plan.

NYGH also plans to become among the largest obstetrics sites in Canada, seeing 5,500 babies delivered a year compared to 4,000 during the transition period. It will expand its neo-natal intensive care unit, ambulatory care services and other areas.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am lactose intolerant and have been using soy milk as an alternative to real milk. I recently found out that the brand I have been using hardly contains any calcium. Is this the case with all soy milk?
A. Many brands of soy milk contain virtually no calcium. Fortunately, several brands have recently emerged on the Canadian market that do contain calcium; in many cases, the amount of calcium is equivalent to that in real milk. Make sure you read the labels carefully and you'll be able to benefit from all the calcium you need without the dairy.
Q. I love salmon but always have people telling me that it is a very fatty fish. Is this true?
A. Salmon does contain more fat than many other types of fish. It is important to remember that it is mostly unsaturated fat, which is the healthier fat, and that salmon still has less fat than beef. Three ounces of grilled or baked salmon contains 155 calories and seven grams of fat. Continue enjoying salmon; it is a low calorie, healthful choice.
Q. My family really likes kiwi fruit. I don't hear much about its nutritional benefits. Can you please fill me in?
A. Kiwi is not only delicious, it is nutritious too. Kiwis are very low in calories at only 46 calories in one medium sized kiwi. A kiwi contains no fat and a whopping 75 milligrams of vitamin C, which is more than 100 percent of your daily requirement for vitamin C. Kiwis are an excellent choice.

Levitts Kosher Foods Inc. is proud to announce that it has met the stringent kosher standards of the international kosher certification agency: Star-K under the supervision of Rabbi Moshe Heinemann of Baltimore, Maryland, one of the world's foremost authorities on the integration of the complexities of food technology and Kosher requirements.

Rabbi Heinemann personally visited Montreal to oversee the certification. Starting at the beginning he inspected the abattoirs, thus ensuring that the schecht was proper and that only true glatt kosher animals are approved. Moving over to Levitts operations plant, Rabbi Heinemann conferred with Ha Rav Hamachshir establishing that soaking and salting and Nikur are done properly.

He then extensively checked all production procedures and ingredients. After meeting with the management at Levitts, Rabbi Heinemann returned to Baltimore confident that all matters of kashrut were thoroughly respected.

"Working closely with the Jewish Community Council of Montreal (MK) we were pleased to find that the addition of the new certification was seamless as all of the required standards were already in place under the MK. This added certification will provide entry in the global marketplace for Levitts products." Advertisement

Jewish doctors struggled to carry on during Holocaust

By DR. A. MARK CLARFIELD
Special to The CJN

Fifty-five years ago this year, the Warsaw Ghetto, "home" to that city's 400,000 Jews, was finally and utterly destroyed by the German army. For 30 months, the Jews had lived there and many had died there. In the end, almost all were sent to a terrible death, mainly in the Treblinka concentration camp.

Over the years, I have read much about the Holocaust and had considered myself, if not an expert, at least fairly well-read on the subject of my people's anguish during World War II. What I had not known much about, perhaps because it seems so oxymoronic, was the issue of medical care in the ghetto. And as a Jew and a physician in Israel, I still see daily in my Holocaust survivor patients echoes of those terrible years — the scars on both their bodies and on their psyches.

Review

The story begins with the health status of pre-war Poland's Jewish community, its medical services and the profession. Until I read Dr. Charles Roland's Courage Under Siege – Starvation, Disease and Death in the Warsaw Ghetto (Oxford University Press 1992), I had not realized the level of poverty of Poland's Jews during the inter-war years.

"During the 1930s, many of Poland's Jews were in dire need of aid," Roland writes. "In 1932, reports... indicated that nearly 100,000 Jewish families – a total of over 400,000 persons – were on the verge of starvation. This was almost one-third of all the Jews in Poland."

The most heart-wrenching stories detail the fate of Warsaw's 100,000 children, almost all of whom died terribly as a result of the conditions in the ghetto, the horrors of the transports to the concentration camp, or if they made it that far, in the Nazi gas chambers.

Amazingly, however, there was an underground medical school in the ghetto, which despite the death and destruction all around, functioned at an incredibly high level for more than a year.

It is difficult to comprehend the Nazi mind as the stories unfold. On the one hand, the Nazis planned terror and brutality, and ensured that conditions would be so bad that death became an everyday event. On the other, the Germans did ensure the supply of enough food and other vital supplies to keep everyone from simply starving to death.

One explanation is found in the Germans' "need" for slave labor (à la Shindler's List). For example, after ridding another Polish town (Lublin) of all of its Jews, the Germans quickly changed course and decided that they had to open a large tailoring establishment in Warsaw, "undoubtedly another instance of the competition that went on regularly between those Germans who wanted every Jew killed immediately and those who saw the desperate need Germany faced for manpower and wanted to use Jewish labor."

The fact that Jewish doctors and nurses struggled on, trying desperately to help their patients despite the increasingly chaotic and impossible conditions is well documented. Anti-epidemic measures were taken, vaccination attempted (for example against typhoid fever), and operations performed. One cannot blame the medical personnel for hoping against hope that their efforts would be justified.

In retrospect, we can see all too clearly that their work was, in the end, almost totally futile. Roland concludes, "The discouraging evening struggles against hunger, contagious disease and injury consumed the residents of the ghetto every day of its existence. The professional services available to support them were grossly inadequate, hampered by lack of money and supplies, by obdurate rulers and by internal dissension. Definitive remedies were known but unavailable and forbidden. But the efforts went on. Medical practitioners labored, committees met, welfare agencies stretched their resources painfully thin; and nurses, pharmacists and others worked at their posts."

Sadly, the Germans had ample help from many of the surrounding Poles. With a few notable exceptions, Warsaw's non-Jewish population was at best indifferent to the fate of the ghetto's inhabitants. At worst, they actively and enthusiastically collaborated with the Nazis.

For example, the high officials in the electric company threatened to cut off power to the Jewish hospital because (hardly a surprise) its payments were in arrears. A surgeon requested five minutes of electricity in order to finish an operation. "The response was reported to be, 'It doesn't matter. So there'll be one less Jew.'" And, Roland adds, "the power was turned off."

The book includes instances of unbelievable cruelty and presents images too terrible to contemplate. For example, deportations to the death camps are described where the Gestapo forced hospital staff to carry immobile patients down to the street.

"Those who could walk were ordered to go out to the street immediately without being given time to dress. About 400 patients were taken to the Umschlagplatz [transfer point] and to Treblinka, any who could not leave their beds being shot there. The Nazis then set fire to the building."

Apart from murder, the three most common causes of death in the ghetto were starvation, typhus and tuberculosis. It is difficult to distinguish when the death from disease was a result of the effects of chronic starvation on the ability of the ghetto's inmates (none too healthy even before the war) to resist infection. The story of typhus, the scourge of the ghetto, is particularly riveting. The terrible irony is that this disease did not simply result from the deteriorating conditions or even from the Nazis' perverse wish to have as many Jews as possible die from it. Rather, the opposite was the case. The German authorities actually tried to stop the spread of this dread disease among the Jews for fear that they would contaminate the Poles, who would in turn pass on the infection to the occupying German forces.

The problem was that the Nazi public health authorities had a totally wrong-headed approach to the epidemiology of the disease and were of course unwilling to be corrected by Jewish physicians in the ghetto, one of whom was a world renowned expert in the field. Tragically, for the one time that the Germans wanted to reduce the incidence of disease among the Jews, their intellectual arrogance and their resulting inappropriate approach served only to make matters worse – for Jew, Pole and German alike.

The Germans allowed the ghetto medical school to be set up because it was labelled Sanitary Courses for Fighting Epidemics. A building was found, courses were given in the evenings and tuition was charged. As the school had to be financially self-sufficient, the monthly fee was 60 zloty (approximately $15), although those that could not afford this paid less, on a sliding scale.

Given the excellent academic qualifications of the Jewish physicians incarcerated in the ghetto, the quality of the teaching was high. In fact, a few students survived, and after the war, their underground studies were recognized and academic credit was given at various medical schools.

Why did I force myself to learn more about this terrible story? As a Jew and as an Israeli doctor, I feel that that I must know how easily our profession was perverted in its German and Polish branches, and how, in the end, medicine is essentially helpless to save lives and relieve suffering when the most elementary conditions for its practice cannot be met.

The story describes the bravery of the Jewish health care workers who suffered along with their patients and at the same time attempted with such determination and in the end so futilely to treat them.

Baycrest rehab unit to stay open

TORONTO — The 32-bed rehabilitation unit has been restored to Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

In a reversal of its previous decision, the Health Services Restructuring Commission (HSRC) has given Baycrest the right to operate the unit. The original decision raised the fear of layoffs among the staff.

The rehab ward is a limited stay unit for patients requiring therapy as a result of musculoskeletal or neurological conditions such as stroke and hip fracture. The goal is to assist the patient to return to living in the community as independently as possible.

Last July, the HSRC had recommended that Baycrest close its rehab unit and transfer the beds to West Park Hospital. Baycrest responded by making submissions that stressed the importance of maintaining the rehab unit at its hospital.

In its final report on rehabilitation services in Toronto, the HSRC noted that rehabilitation is integrated with a broad range of programs at Baycrest.

Israel opening its doors to investment: Ne'eman

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Canadian business community, operating under a free trade environment, has enormous investment opportunities in the expanding and increasingly deregulated Israeli economy, says Israeli Minister of Finance Ya'akov Ne'eman.

"We are doing our utmost to lift any barriers whatsoever on Canadian companies coming to Israel. Canadian company exports to Israel have increased 55.8 percent during the first year of the [Canada-Israel] trade agreement. It shows you that the road to Israel is open," says Ne'eman.

Ne'eman, who served as a member of the board of governors of the Bank of Israel, adds that countries cannot have strong economies "unless [they] have open borders. And we in Israel do have open borders. Under the free trade agreement, I see no limitation for Canadian companies coming to Israel or Israeli companies coming to Canada. Don't forget, the major investments in Israel in recent years were made by Canadians."

The current Israeli government is accelerating a deregulation and privatization process that commenced in the 1980s but only now is moving into full gear. Sectors such as banking, electrical utilities, telecommunications and financial markets have been deregulated and/or privatized.

He hopes to see the privatization of the remaining two banks in Israel that are owned by the government. There is also a move to further privatize Israeli airlines El Al and the aircraft industry, and to enhance competition in local public transit. Foreign currency restrictions have been eased so that Israelis can now hold foreign bank accounts.

The main engine for the Israeli economy is its rapidly growing high-technology, knowledge-based sector that is resulting in the development of new products and the building of new plants and research and development facilities. Associated Press has called Israel "a world Internet superpower," and the country's workforce has more scientists and engineers per capita than any other country.

"We are a high-tech economy. Israel has more high-tech startups than any other country in the world except the United States. We have today close to 3,000 startups in high-tech, many of them joint ventures with foreign countries," says Ne'eman.

The darker side of a less regulated economy is higher unemployment, Ne'eman says, and he sees this as the main problem in the economy. For example, while deregulation of the telephone industry resulted in an overnight 80 percent drop in prices to consumers, many workers lost their jobs. The current unemployment rate is 8.3 percent.

"In a country that encourages immigration, it's a high rate," says Ne'eman.

In tackling unemployment, the Israeli government is launching a series of infrastructure programs. Recently, it announced 70 infrastructure projects that will create jobs, encourage investment and result in more effective traffic flow.

Also under consideration is the railroad from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv. Currently it takes more than two hours to drive the 60 kilometres between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

A Canadian-led consortium has recently been awarded the contract to build the Cross-Israel Highway, one of Israel's largest infrastructure projects ever.

But Canadian companies are not alone in the bidding. Japanese and European companies are also looking to profit from Israel's emerging economy.

The Palestinian Authority regions are also likely to prosper under free trade, Ne'eman says. If there is economic integration between Israel, the Palestinians and neighboring countries, he adds, peace will be a "durable peace, because this would be a deterrent of any hostilities, terrorist actions or wars.

"It's my belief that we should concentrate – and here Canadian companies can be very helpful, like other western countries – to include the economy of the Palestinians and neighboring countries."

On linking economic prosperity and peace, Ne'eman presents what he calls his triangle theory.

"The best [situation] for economics and peace is for an Israeli company to develop a product, but it should be produced in the Palestinian Authority, Jordan or Egypt, where labor costs are much lower, and the distribution and marketing should be done by a multinational corporation. This definitely would encourage the peace process. That's my personal belief."

Violinist helped form Israel's music culture

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Hungarian-born violinist Lorand Fenyves, a world-renowned violin teacher based in Toronto and a former concertmaster of the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra (IPO), played a formative role in shaping the music culture of the State of Israel.

"I am one of the seeds out of which Israel's musical culture grew. I am proud of that," Fenyves, 80, said in a recent interview at his art-filled home in Cedarvale.

Fenyves, who has made Canada his home for the last 32 years, was recently honored by the Royal Conservatory of Music for his contribution as a teacher. He was the featured artist at the Celebrating Lifetimes of Music evening, an annual concert series presented by the conservatory.

At the ceremony that evening, a representative of the Hungarian government also bestowed upon Fenyves a medal for a lifetime of musical achievement.

He expressed some ambivalence about this recognition from Hungary, the country he left – he did not return for 50 years – to escape anti-Semitism.

He made aliyah in 1936, joined the fledgling Palestine Orchestra (today known as the IPO) and co-founded both the Tel Aviv Conservatory and Academy of Music and the Palestine String Quartet (later the Israel String Quartet).

The co-founder of the Tel Aviv Conservatory and Academy of Music was his sister Alice, an accomplished violinist. The two had made aliyah together.

Fenyves characterized the spirit of the chalutzim as a time of complete selflessness. "The me generation didn't exist. It was natural to give. That's why you were there."

He also recounted in vivid detail one of the most emotional performances of his chalutzim years: playing Hatikvah after David Ben-Gurion announced the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948.

The orchestra was on the podium with Ben-Gurion when he made the historic declaration of statehood, Fenyves said. "It was a great moment. [But] the great joy was interrupted by the invasion of the Arabs."

He recalled dozens of concerts in perilous venues during World War II and the War of Independence. He also pointed to a commemorative picture of the Palestine Orchestra playing a concert in the desert as a send-off for the Jewish Brigade, which in 1944 was authorized by the English to join the Allies in combat.

Kash character key in End of Civilization

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Can you picture a cop who shoots up cocaine, has a passion for prostitutes and ends up his investigation on one case in his underwear?

That's the character (Donny) that Daniel Kash is playing in The End of Civilization (at Factory Theatre April 24 to May 31). Whether Donny and his partner cop Max will do even crazier things in this sequel to Adult Entertainment is a secret that Kash is keeping to himself.

"All I know is that George Walker, the writer and director, is a person who believes in giving actors a chance to do their own thing, he's a master at in-your-face comedy, and the End of Civilization is a very funny play."

Kash, the "mid-30s" son of singer Maureen Forrester and musician Eugene Kash, was born and brought up in Montreal, but he now travels so much that he considers his home is "on the road." He went to drama school in England, worked there for eight years and also spent two years in New York. In Canada, he's had starring roles in theatre (Stratford Festival and Canadian Stage among them), film and TV.

"I'm a practising Jew and my heritage is an important influence in my work," he said.

His favorite roles were as Stanley in Streetcar Named Desire and as the Duke in Rigoletto directed by Brian Richmond at Threatre Passe Muraille.

It will be Kash's first role in Walker's Suburban Motel series, the first three plays of which were a smash success at Factory last fall. End of Civilizaion is the first of the new three this season that include Featuring Loretta (May 7 to June 21) and Risk Everything (June 11 to July 26).

GUITAR-FLUTE DUO RELEASES NEW CD

Ivan Zilman, a Montreal-born composer-guitarist who teaches privately in the Beach area of Toronto, has just released a CD of flute and guitar with his musical partner, Margot Rydall, a teacher at Toronto's Royal Conservatory of Music.

Together known as Duo, Zilman and Rydall play a refreshing mix of classical and contemporary-jazz. Judging by the selections on this CD, their taste in music is as impeccable as their playing. Duo treats listeners to well-chosen pieces by Frescobaldi, Debussy, Ravel, Bartok as well as Richard Rodgers and jazz composers Thelonious Monk and Billy Strayhorn.

The pair also deliver a poignant arrangement of John Williams' Theme from Schindler's List. After seeing the film, Rydall was "profoundly affected by it and felt she wanted to do something musical to stand as a memorial or tribute," Zilman says. At Rydall's urging, he composed the arrangement for flute and guitar, which hadn't existed previously.

With this CD, Zilman and Rydall aptly demonstrate that all one needs is a high level of musicianship to set a lovely musical mood. Platoons of strings, horns and percussionists, or a magic bag of studio tricks, aren't required. Duo's CD is available in record stores in and around Toronto.

have studied with Fenyves, who left Israel to spend nine years in Geneva as concertmaster of L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande and as a teacher at the Geneva Conservatory, before settling in Canada with his family in 1965.

In 1964, he accepted an invitation to teach at the Jeunesses Musicales summer camp at Mt. Orford in Quebec's Eastern Townships. He played an instrumental role in establishing the acclaimed Mt. Orford String Quartet, which was later based at the University of Toronto's Faculty of Music. In 1965, Fenyves joined the music faculty to coach the quartet.

Although he officially retired in 1983, Fenyves maintains a hectic schedule. He continues to teach at U of T, as well as at the Glen Gould Professional School of the Royal Conservatory of Music and the University of Western Ontario.

During school breaks, he travels to Europe, where England and Hungary are annual destinations, to perform concerts and give master classes.

He and his wife Vera also visit Israel yearly to see their daughter Thalia and three grandchildren in Tel Aviv. Their older daughter, Daphna, a physician, lives in Montreal.

Life after Auschwitz

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Is there life after Auschwitz? That's the central question at the core of The Truce, a film based on the experiences of a soulful Italian Holocaust survivor.

The resilient survivor is none other than Primo Levi, the acclaimed Jewish writer who turned his wartime diary into a 1963 novel which inspired this movie, due to open in Toronto on May 15.

Levi, a chemist born in Turin in 1919, joined the partisans after German troops occupied the north and center of Italy. This occurred following the collapse of Benito Mussolini's fascist government in 1943.

In December of that year, Levi was interned in an Italian concentration camp, and two months later, was shipped straight to Auschwitz.

Liberated by the Red Army in January 1945, Levi was sent to a Soviet resettlement camp in Poland before being set free. For the next four months, he and a group of Italian deportees wandered around war-ravished Europe before reaching Italy.

Safely back home, Levi, bearing witness to the horrors he had seen, began to write. His first published work was a memoir, If This is a Man. Settling into a job as a chemist in a paint factory, Levi continued writing, winning plaudits for novels such as Natural Histories, Periodic Table and If Not Now, Then When?

On April 11, 1987, he committed suicide, never having come to grips with an obsessive conundrum. As he wrote: "Auschwitz exists, therefore God cannot. I can find no solution to that dilemma. I search for one, to no avail."

The Truce, directed by Francesco Rosi, unfolds over a nine month period from Levi's sudden liberation to his rapturous homecoming in October 1945.

It's a sombre, though uplifting, film which keeps faith with the interrelated themes of Levi's novel, the process of reawakening and the reacquisition of hope.

Shot in Ukraine under reportedly difficult conditions, The Truce, starring the supple American actor John Turturro as Levi, focuses on his transition from the maw of death to the portal of life.

As Levi and his companions wend their way by foot and by train through the Soviet Union, Poland, Romania, Hungary and Austria, they rediscover the simple yet profound pleasures of ordinary human existence.

Triumphing over cold, hunger, disease and idleness, Levi learns yet again to appreciate the things he may have taken for granted before his ordeal: the value of friendship, including female company; the satisfaction of a decent meal; the meaning of peace and tranquility; the allure of nature; and the sound of a felicitous passage in a musical composition.

In an understated but compelling performance, Turturro and a strong supporting cast bring these rediscoveries into sharp relief against the backdrop of flashbacks from the soul-crushing purgatory of Auschwitz.

Reawakening from his dormant, bug-eyed state, Levi finds his bearings in, among other places, a makeshift dance hall where spiritually scarred men and women dance cheek to cheek to Irving Berlin's soothing music, and in a springtime forest where shafts of light illuminate him from head to toe.

In terms of tone, spirit and looks, The Truce is the antithesis of a typical American studio film. I suspect that Levi would have liked it.

Gala concert honors lost composers

TORONTO — A gala reception sponsored by New Music Concerts on May 20 at George Weston Recital Hall, Ford Centre for the Arts will honor Jewish composers whose lives were cut short by the Holocaust.

Anne Michaels, author of Fugitive Pieces, and other musicians and artists will gather to pay tribute to the composers: Erwin Schullhoff, Leo Smit and Laszlo Weiner.

The pieces were all composed before the composers were arrested by the Nazis.

Schulloff was born in Prague and served in the German army in World War 1. In 1941, he was arrested and deported to a camp in Bavaria where he died in 1942.

Smit was born in Amsterdam and studied piano and composition at the conservatory there. He completed his last work in 1943 before he perished in Auschwitz.

Weiner was born in Hungary and entered the Franz Liszt Academy of Music in Budapest. He was shot in 1944 in a labor camp in Csepreg.

For gala reservations ($150–includes prime seats and an autographed copy of Fugitive Pieces) call 416-961-9594. Regular tickets are $27, $31 and $40. Call TicketMaster 416-872-2222.

Holtzer brothers love life on the open water

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For that matter, so has his little brother, Ethan, 10.

The two siblings, whose idea of a good time on a lazy Sunday afternoon in January is to go sailing on the frigid waters of Lake Ontario, have taken their tiny Optis (short for Optimists) to regattas from Toronto to South America. Most recently, the two competed in the South American championships in Cartagena, Columbia. Out of 166 Optis in the race, the Holtzer brothers finished 140th and 141st, with the smaller Ethan finishing slightly ahead of his bigger and heavier brother.

Last year, Ari participated in the World Opti Championships in Ireland and ranked first among the five participating Canadians. He finished 148th in the event, with the next nearest Canuck 22 places behind. He also sailed in a regatta in Scotland last summer and at a number of venues in Canada.

With the weather warming up, the brothers have scheduled lots of sailing for their summertime agendas. There will be races in and around Toronto, a June competition in St. Thomas, a regatta in Annapolis, Md., the U.S. Nationals in Boston and the Canadian Olympic Regatta in Kingston (CORK) to close out the summer season.

In between events, the brothers will spend most of their days training and practising on Lake Ontario – nary a landlubber between 'em.

Ethan Holtzer

The Holtzers come by their sealegs naturally. Theirs is a sailing family with a long-standing membership at the Island Yacht Club (IYC). Ethan's first experience on a boat came when he was only a couple of weeks old when his father, Igal, brought him on board the family boat.

He first starting sailing in an Albacore-class boat and then advanced to an Opti at age seven. The Opti, an eight foot by four foot "bathtub," with its squared-off prow and single sail, is perfect for youngsters to learn on. At the IYC junior program, Ethan was taught about safety, controlling the sail and other skills needed on the open water.

Last year, as part of the IYC's "green fleet" of beginners, Ethan sailed in the kids' events and regularly finished first. He travelled to Montreal for a competition for kids 13 and under and finished first there as well.

Despite that first place finish, Ethan wasn't completely satisfied with his performance. Since that time, he's learned a lot about sailing, especially from the Americans who he's met at various regattas, and he now realizes that in Montreal he tacked (zigzagged into the wind) way too much.

"Now I would take only two big tacks up to the mark (buoy) and stay in the clear," he said.

Despite his newfound ability, he said the sailors in South America and from other hot climates are tough to beat. They have the advantage of year-round, good weather sailing and many are used to the stronger winds and salt water you get at sea.

As one of the oldest competitors in Cartagena, Ari was hampered by being heavier (145 lbs.) than most of the other sailors.

"I didn't do that great. I was probably the biggest guy there. It slowed me down a lot so all the little guys flew by me," he said.

Having outgrown the Opti, Ari is moving on to the Byte. Built like a small Laser, the Byte is double the size of the Opti, faster, and has a bigger sail.

Ari plans to be on the water a lot this summer, putting in from three and a half to seven hours a day. He'll be sticking closer to home than he has in other years, with no exotic trips planned. Instead, he'll compete in regattas in Montreal, Frenchman's Bay (Whitby) and CORK.

Competitive racers both, the brothers hope to one day represent Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel. For Ari, that would only be a stepping stone to his ultimate goal, the Olympic Games.

About families

Dear Susan,

I was alarmed to find out that a "skinny" club exists at my daughter's school. My 8-year-old had the good sense to decline membership. According to my daughter, each member of the club must be skinny and wealthy. Should I contact the school about my concerns?

Dear Reader,

Many thanks for sharing your story about the "skinny" club. Eating disorders used to surface on the cusp of adolescence. Now, regrettably, preteens are taking up the cause.

This preteen group is highly susceptible to peer pressure. At this point boys and girls lead separate lives. The quest for perfection lies with the girls themselves, both as individuals and as members of the group.

In their quest to conquer their body weight (a reflection of low self-esteem), they seem equally driven to prove their wealth. This internal/external dance is lethal and can lead to death. The young girl ultimately finds herself between a rock and a hard place.

The parents of these girls may have to pause and reflect on the signs of this lethal dance. Many may find it hard to see the signs, as they too are mired in their own pursuits. In their own quest for wealth, they may have overlooked their child's need for structure and safety. Their daughter's pursuit of thinness may be a cry for help.

You are wise to advise the school. The administration, in concert with their support staff, could offer a truly unique program. Parental involvement goes without saying as the secrecy needs to be broken.

I am glad that your daughter had the good judgment to decline their membership. She deserves a lot of praise for not succumbing to the peer pressure. Encourage her individuality through more appropriate channels.

Redeployment formula sought

Washington talks continued amidst rioting in West Bank and Gaza

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called last week for the creation of a tripartite committee to monitor Palestinian "incitement to violence."

The suggestion came as he and his aides sought a bridging formula that might eventually enable the IDF to withdraw from more than nine percent of the West Bank without immediately complying with the U.S. recommendation that 13.1 percent be given up.

"The committee could include legislators from all three sides," Netanyahu said in a speech to the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, indicating that it could consist of Israelis, Americans and Palestinians.

Netanyahu's presentation of his ideas to the institute and in a series of meetings on Capitol Hill, preceded his second round of talks with U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, which started late last Thursday night.

Netanyahu confirmed that the depth of the IDF's third redeployment in the West Bank had been the overriding issue in his talks with Albright and the concurrent deliberations of the Israeli and American experts.

"We have to know how much more land will have to be given up in a third redeployment," Netanyahu said in his speech. "The issue is not how many slices [of land there will be], but the total amount."

Implicit in his remarks was the notion that there must be a finite end to the process of withdrawal in the West Bank and that the more territory to be relinquished in the third pullback, the less will be handed over in the pending second one.

This was also his approach in a series of meetings with legislators on Capitol Hill.

Netanyahu's first session there was with the powerful Senate House Committee on Foreign Policy, where he was warmly greeted by House Speaker Newt Gingrich and Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott. At his side on the dais was Likud MK Meir Sheetrit.

Peres: 'Choice is clear'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He may have assumed the mantle of elder statesman, but Shimon Peres has jettisoned few, if any, of his views on Mideast peace – the same views that won him, Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat a Nobel Peace Prize; namely, that Palestinians should have their own independent state.

Peres made that clear here last week, both in a CJN interview, and to a select group of local leaders of State of Israel Bonds, which sponsored his brief visit to Toronto.

The former two-time prime minister, foreign minister and major architect of the Olso peace accords, was here primarily to pay tribute to 30 Canadian Machalniks – foreign volunteers who fought in Israel's 1948 War of Independence.

Peres did that before an audience of several hundred, which also came to see Shalom '98, an entertainment extravaganza of leading Israeli musicians, dancers and singers, including the world-renowned Yaffa Yarkoni.

But in a 20-minute interview with The CJN prior to his appearance, a tired and pale Peres, now 75, explained why he continues to support an independent Palestinian state, and why the current government of Benjamin Netanyahu is in danger of alienating its best friend and ally, the United States.

Peres warned that keeping Palestinians under Israeli jurisdiction would have dire consequences for Israel.

"We have four million Palestinians. We have 4.7 million Jews. We have to decide what we want," he said in a quiet voice. "If it's a binational state, it will be a binational tragedy, sort of a Bosnia.

Swiss guard recounts cloak-and-dagger tale

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Christoph Meili still fears for his life.

He now lives in New Jersey and works in New York, thousands of miles from his native Switzerland. But every unexpected sound and movement reminds him that he's still loathed and feared – all because he helped Jews, and in the process, tarnished his country's once-sterling reputation.

Meili, now 30, is the former night watchman at the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS), who discovered that his employer, the country's largest private bank, was shredding thousands of Holocaust-era documents.

He rescued some of the papers and made them public, setting off a storm of controversy that resulted in his receiving death threats against him and his family, being fired from his job and condemned as a traitor, and ultimately, becoming the first Swiss citizen to win political asylum in the United States.

The documents he salvaged were the closest thing yet to a smoking gun. They allegedly prove that beginning in 1933, the year the Nazis came to power, Jewish properties in Berlin were plundered by the Reich and their ownership turned over to Swiss banks, including the Swiss National Bank.

Meili rescued only 60 documents and three books of papers, but they set off a cataclysmic chain of events, and moved people a step closer to believing what had been widely suspected: that Swiss banks were the Third Reich's willing money-launderers.

Meili recounted his story, now the stuff of Hollywood, at last week's annual Toronto Hadassah-WIZO Youth Aliyah/Youth Services luncheon. A poised young man and devout Protestant, he spoke casually of kidnapping threats against his two young children, aged five and three. "They told me I could pay for them with the money I got for the Jews," he told the 250 women present.

His story began in January 1997. While making his usual rounds at UBS, he went to turn off a light in the shredding room, and found stacks of yellowing, war-era documents waiting to be destroyed.

His interest in the period had been buoyed after seeing Schindler's List. "I was shocked. I thought these were not for shredding," Meili told The CJN in an interview. "I thought these were important, that they should be on the table."

He took some of the documents home and showed them to his wife. The next day, he called a local newspaper, which expressed little interest.

He then called the Israeli embassy in Berne. "They told me to mail everything," he recalled.

Finally, he handed the papers over the head of the Jewish community in Zurich, which promptly turned them over to police.

After that, recalled Meili, "everyone went crazy."

He was suspended, then fired, from his job, with the bank's president publicly expressing doubts about Meili's motives. After the Swiss media reported the story, Meili received dozens of death threats, and rumors began circulating that he was working for the Mossad. The police began investigating him.

Soon, he was contacted by Ed

Gilbert's Israel

Last week I, along with several hundred others, attended a lecture by the renowned historian Sir Martin Gilbert.

Ever the gentlemen, Gilbert spoke with the elan, the grace and the complete mastery over his subject that, over the years, have come to typify him and his work.

He was in Toronto, in part, to launch his monumental new work, entitled simply, Israel, A History. Published in Canada by turnerbooks, it is a substantive and esthetic tour de force. Recently, in this space, (April 16) I referred to the book as "magisterial and majestically written."

It sweeps across the full horizon of Israel's modern history from the late-19th century pre-Basle ideological and intellectual stirrings, through the post-Herzl, pre-state developments to the partition vote in 1947, the fateful founding of the state in 1948 and each subsequent, tumultuous, decade up to the latter part of 1997.

But true to the Gilbert method of history-writing, the work not only sweeps across the horizon, it settles with intriguing and insightful detail, on the people, places and events whose many unique and inspiring profiles are outlined on that blue and white horizon.

Gilbert has also included some 43 different maps to provide a sense of geographical context as well as assist the reader in joining the fluidity of time with the constancy of place. The valuable use of maps in this way is a study device that the author has elevated to its own art form over the past years.

But, like the humanity it chronicles, the book is not without its imperfections. Occasionally small inaccuracies creep in, such as the reference in the introduction to the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin having occurred in October 1995. In fact it happened in November.

If the book is imperfect though, it is still nevertheless both breathtaking in its scope, poignant and compelling in its force.

Following are only two very brief excerpts to show Gilbert's unequalled, trademark ability to find sources and quotes that elucidate the text to a degree that one would not normally find in the "standard" history text.

From the letter by Ahad Ha'am to Chaim Weizmann in 1918 congratulating Weizmann on presiding over the ceremony at the laying of the foundation stone of the Hebrew University on Mount Scopus:

"We Jews have been taught by our history to appreciate the real value of laying foundations for future developments. Our share, as a people, in the building up of the general culture of Humanity has been nothing else than the laying of its foundations long before the superstructures were built upon those foundations by other peoples.

"When in time to come the Hebrew University stands proudly erect on the historic mountain, equipped with all ancient and modern instruments for the cultivation of mind and soul – what else will be its function but the laying of foundation-stones, on which our future national life will be rebuilt."

"Then Abdullah entered the room. he was very pale and seemed under great strain... We talked for about an hour. I started the conversation by coming to the point at once. 'Have you broken your promise to me, after all?' I asked him.

"He didn't answer my question directly. Instead he said: 'When I made that promise, I thought I was in control of my own destiny and could do what I thought right. But since then I have learned otherwise.' Then he went on to say that before he had been alone, but now, 'I am one of five,' the other four, we gathered, being Egypt, Syria, Lebanon and Iraq. Still, he thought war could be averted.

"'Why are you in such a hurry to proclaim your State?' he asked me. 'What is the rush? You are so impatient!' I told him that I didn't think that a people who had waited 2,000 years should be described as being 'in a hurry,' and he seemed to accept that."

Gilbert's search for and inclusion of such widely elucidative anecdotal material ensures that his text reaches far beyond a "mere" narrative of history.

* * *

In last week's column I wrote about my discussion with Paul Michaels of the Canada Israel Committee regarding the media's Israel at 50 coverage. Michaels called to point out an error that might be corrected on the record.

In the last "bulleted" paragraph of the story, 1993 was used as the date before which Palestinian political institutions had always rejected compromise and diplomacy.

True to Michael's complete allegiance to factual accuracy, he called to say that 1988 would have been a more appropriate date due to the meeting of the Palestine National Council in Algiers at which they informally implied their full recognition and legitimacy of the State of Israel.

In this issue, on page 7, staff reporter Ron Csillag, also comments on the book in the context of his meeting with the author last week.

Israel must accept U.S. peace proposals: Husseini

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Palestinians will accept nothing less than an Israeli redeployment from the West Bank based on current U.S. proposals, a senior Palestinian leader declared in a recent interview.

Urging the United States to force Israel into accepting its plan for a 13 percent withdrawal, Faisal Husseini claimed that only "sufficient international pressure" will have an effect on Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"The ball is in the American court," said Husseini, a member of the PLO's executive council and the Palestine Authority's top official in Jerusalem. "We accepted the American proposals and Israel did not. Will the U.S. lead the process or not?"

Husseini, who met with local Jewish community officials during his brief visit here two weeks ago, accused the Israeli government of pushing the region toward "an explosion and a circle of violence" that will exact a high toll on all sides.

"Netanyahu believes in a sum zero game. He is a man who believes in the logic of power."

Here as a guest of Palestine House and the Canadian Arab Federation, he said that the peace process has slipped into "a coma."

Husseini – the scion of a prominent Palestinian family who spent six years under Israeli house arrest and 42 months in prison before and during the 1987-93 initifadah – warned that Islamic fundamentalist radicals will gain the ascendancy in the Palestinian self-rule areas should the peace process collapse.

Were that to happen, the influence of the militants would seep into Lebanon, Jordan, Egypt and parts of Israel inhabited by Israeli Arabs, he predicted.

Faisal Husseini

Looking sombre throughout the interview, Husseini, 58, raised the prospect of a unilateral declaration of statehood in May 1999 by Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestine Authority (PA), if the peace process dissolves.

"He will have no choice but to do that if he wants to go on leading the Palestinian people," observed Husseini, whose late father, Abdel al-Kadr, was one of the most famous Palestinian commanders of the first Arab-Israeli war in 1948-49.

He dismissed Netanyahu's claim that an independent Palestinian state would be a source of instability or a threat to Israel. A sovereign Palestinian state would be demilitarized, and would focus its energies on social and economic needs, he added. "We will be a poor state, with no oil and gold."

Husseini seemed unfazed by tacit Israeli threats to annex segments of the West Bank in the event of a declaration of Palestinian statehood. "Netanyahu is already doing it," he said, referring to the expansion of settlements and the confiscation of land.

Blasting the Israeli prime minister, he said, "Netanyahu is not a pragmatist but an ideologue."

Husseini claimed that the PA has exerted utmost efforts to keep terrorism in check. "We have done everything Israel has asked of us, even arresting people without a trial."

He said that the three suicide bombings which have rocked Tel Aviv and Jerusalem since March 1997 were carried out by Palestinians from Area B of the West Bank, whose security is in Israel's hands.

Historic rights

"There has not been a single attack from Area A since Netanyahu's election," he noted. Security in Area A, which comprises almost three percent of the West Bank, is enforced by the PA.

"Do you believe we can provide full security with only three percent of the land?"

Husseini, who is related to the former grand mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini, said that the PA expects a complete Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank once final status negotiations have been completed. "In the end, the Palestinians will get it. These are areas that must be under Palestinian sovereignty."

Asked whether Israel has historic rights in the West Bank, he retorted,"We have rights in Galilee, Jaffa, Ashdod, Ashkelon..."

Husseini, who helped establish Fatah's first guerrilla training camps in Lebanon in the 1960s, said the Palestinians will not tolerate autonomous Israeli settlements in their state. However, Jewish settlers are welcomed to remain behind after an Israeli pullout. "I have no problem with Jews living with us."

Husseini is confident that Israel will eventually relinquish the settlements in the West Bank. "Begin said he wouldn't give up the Sinai settlements, and he did."

He acknowledged that, under the terms of the Oslo accords, the PA is obliged to refrain from incitement against Israel. "This incitement from the Palestinian side should stop," he said, claiming that the PA has taken steps to curb it.

But in this respect, Israel has also breached the agreement, he charged, citing two examples.

Jewish settlers imprisoned for murdering Palestinians have been pardoned. And Israel has not removed a memorial in the West Bank settlement of Kiryat Arba built in honor of Baruch Goldstein. A doctor from Brooklyn, Goldstein killed 29 Palestinians in a Hebron mosque in February 1994 before being pummeled to death.

"Israel must stop believing that Palestinian blood is cheap."

Asked if he had a message for Jews in Canada, Husseini said: "This peace process can end the cycle of bloodshed and violence for children of both sides. I would like them to convince Israel that the next generation should live in peace, to convince Mr. Netanyahu that peace can create security."

During a working dinner at B'nai Brith headquarters, Husseini discussed topical issues with Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple, Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress, Simon Rosenbloom of Peace Now, Norman Godfrey of the Canada-Israel Committee and Frank Dimant of B'nai Brith.

"It was a courteous, calm, friendly and helpful meeting," said Rashad Saleh, chair of Palestine House, an educational and cultural centre in Mississauga. "Both sides voiced their opinions and concerns."

Rabbi Marmur called the meeting business-like. As he put it, "I was neither frosty nor particularly cordial, but straight forward."

Govt. fights Hobson law suit

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lawyers representing the federal government and six senior officials were in Ontario Court last week in a bid to throw out a law suit filed by the former head of the Nazi war crimes unit.

The suit, filed by Bill Hobson, was "frivolous or vexatious," an abuse of the court process and was filed after the limitation period had elapsed, the lawyers argued.

Hobson, who headed the unit from 1987 to 1990, has claimed $2.1 million in damages for nervous shock and mental suffering resulting from actions taken by government officials connected to the war crimes unit.

He claims lawyers subordinate to him refused to follow his instructions to pursue denaturalization and deportation against war crimes suspects and that bureaucrats made intentional and negligent misrepresentations to him about the unit's mandate, causing him to spend countless hours of fruitless work on cases that had no chance of proceeding.

He also claims that John Sims, currently an assistant deputy attorney general, wrote to the Law Society of Upper Canada as a way of threatening his livelihood as a lawyer.

All the events complained of by Hobson, except the Sims letter, occurred before 1990 and are therefore far beyond the six month period in which suits against civil servants can be launched, argued Sheila Block, lawyer for Bruce MacFarlane, Peter Kremer, John Tait, Yvan Roy, Kim Prost and Sims. In addition, the issues complained of by Hobson were "not actionable," she said.

Bruce Carr-Harris, representing the government of Canada, argued that government policy decisions "are protected from tort... The principle is that policy decisions are decisions made at a high level... Someone has to make them and the rest of us have to live with them."

He said "the overwhelming pick for Canadians was criminal prosecutions" of war crime suspects.

In other developments, Hobson has asked for a judicial review of the McCamus report, which exonerated the unit from allegations of anti-Semitism. Hobson claims McCamus made several procedural errors in gathering the information that went into the report.

Report's methodology concerns CJC

TORONTO — Bill Hobson may have found an ally for his critique of the way law professor John McCamus gathered information for a report that exonerated the war crimes unit of anti-Semitism.

Canadian Jewish Congress is concerned over the way McCamus specifically mentioned incidents involving Congress but failed to get Congress' side of events, said Jack Silverstone, the organization's legal counsel and executive director.

One key issue involves a statement made by the war crime unit's former director, Peter Kremer, to Silverstone and Eric Vernon, CJC's representative in Ottawa, that he "would not stick his neck out like [Hobson] did."

Kremer denied making the statement and McCamus accepted Kremer's denial along with notes taken by Justice Department lawyer Peter Sutton. But Kremer "absolutely, categorically, 100 percent, I remember it like yesterday" made the statement, Silverstone said. In addition, Vernon's contemporaneous notes back up their version of events, but McCamus never asked to see Vernon's notes, Silverstone added.

Another "absolute eyeopener" in the report was the way McCamus referred to a suggestion that former unit lawyer Arnold Fradkin was leaking confidential documents to Silverstone.

"That had no basis in reality, but what bothered me is that he never asked me about it. I would have liked my vehement denial to be in the report," Silverstone stated.

Christie on attack in Zundel case

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, it seems the more things change the more they stay the same.

Last week, Zundel's lawyer Doug Christie reprised a role he's been playing since 1985. He adopted a sarcastic, sneering tone to grill Frederick Schweitzer, an expert on historic anti-Semitism. In a rapid-fire manner in which he repeatedly interrupted the witness, Christie pestered Schweitzer with questions designed to show the reasonableness of various anti-Jewish views.

Christie suggested the Talmud was "flagrantly" anti-Christian; he cited author Gore Vidal quoting John Kennedy who allegedly claimed Truman's 1948 election campaign was saved by a $20-million donation from "Zionists;" he quoted Vidal as saying no other group "hijacked" the U.S. taxpayer for so much to pay for their homeland and he asked how that is different from Zundel's calling it "a racket."

In barely over one hour, Christie asked question after question in which Jews inevitably came out as malefactors of some sort. He touched on the controversy over Deir Yassin, on whether Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Shamir were terrorists, on whether the Talmud counsels deceit, and on whether speaking the truth can ever be considered anti-Semitic.

At one point, Christie, who has repeatedly championed the cause of free speech, appeared ready to blow a gasket when he claimed the Talmud referred to Jesus as "burning in hell in human excrement." He asked Schweitzer, whom he described as a "Christian Zionist," whether he considered that "blasphemous."

Zundel meanwhile, who once carried a cross to court to ensure himself media attention, sat quietly near Christie, wearing a black kippah.

The tribunal had earlier been told that Zundel had investigated his heritage and now believes he may have some Jewish ancestry, said Marvin Kurz, who represented B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

This bizarre series of events took place as part of a hearing under the Canadian Human Rights Act. A tribunal is hearing a complaint that Zundel operated an Internet Web site that promoted contempt of Jews. Holocaust survivor Sabina Citron and the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations initiated the complaint. The League, Canadian Jewish Congress and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre have joined the case as interveners.

Zundel has denied he operated the California-based "Zundelsite." But as he had in two previous criminal trials when he was charged with distributing material denying the Holocaust, Zundel, through his counsel, attempted to suggest the criticism of the Jews found in the Web site was justified. The case continues.

Prolific Martin Gilbert pens history of Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Sir Martin Gilbert

TORONTO — Writing a history of modern Israel must be like trying to decide when to get off an amusement park ride: too soon, and you miss the best parts; stay on the ride and, well, you'll never get your book written.

Such was the dilemma – if one could call it that – facing Martin Gilbert, among the world's pre-eminent historians of the 20th century and certainly of the Holocaust. The idea for a retrospective look at the Jewish State first came to him in 1973, two years after he had held long talks with David Ben-Gurion. The day after he arrived in Israel, the Yom Kippur War broke out, and history, as is often the case in the Middle East, was overtaken by events – events that later would become history themselves.

But Gilbert's timing, intentional or not, is impeccable. His latest effort, Israel: A History, (Turnerbooks, 750 pages, $49) arrives on the state's 50th birthday – a fitting gift to the land and its supporters.

The ultra-prolific Gilbert (he was introduced at Beth David Synagogue prior to a May10 talk as someone who has probably written more books than many of us have read) has penned what is already being hailed as a definitive history of Israel. The distinguished Oxford historian, official biographer of Winston Churchill and author of nearly 60 weighty historical tomes, chronicles the state's story from its idealistic beginnings, almost to the present.

Written in the seamless, leisurely style for which he has become famous, Sir Martin (he was knighted in 1995) combines standard historical research with his own intimate knowledge of the country (he lives in Jerusalem for a good part of each year.) As well, he quotes liberally from the letters, diaries and eyewitness accounts of Ben-Gurion, Moshe Dayan, Golda Meir, Teddy Kollek, and dozens of ordinary Israelis. The result, enthused Publishers Weekly, is "a gripping epic."

The work covers all the military conflicts, including the intifadah; the political watersheds: Camp David and the Oslo Accords; and the human face of Israel: patterns of settlement, the society, culture and the economy of a nation at odds with its neighbors, and sometimes, itself.

The book appears, by Gilbert's own admission, "20 years later than intended. It was originally conceived for Israel's 30th anniversary [in 1978]. Ironically, Israeli policy changed in 1978 [with the Camp David peace accords with Egypt]. So I had the historian's sense that that should be part of the history," he told The CJN in an interview, following a hectic day of media meetings.

Asked whether the dense volume, complete with 40 pages of historical maps, is a weight off his shoulders, Gilbert smiles. "I wouldn't start it today," he says.

But he's quick to add that it's not intended as a fond gift to Israel on its 50th.

"I don't think you'll find the Palestinian view presented in such detail [in any other history]. I was drawn to the project by Israel's faults and weaknesses, as much as by its strengths."

But was his objectivity clouded by his obvious affections for Israel?

"You can't take Israel's side," he rejoins, "because Israel has no 'side.' It has several competing perspectives."

Canada merits attention in the book, for its favoring of a Jewish state, sending of volunteer fighters in 1948, and opposing the UN's Zionism is Racism resolution. Gilbert still holds a special fondness for this country. He was a child war evacuee from Britain, and spent four years in Toronto living with the Laizner family.

Gilbert worries little over the current impasse between Israel and the United States. Although this is "definitely a low point in relations," talks continue every day, even if they are not between high-level officials.

And Gilbert reserves some praise for Yasser Arafat, whom he says has done much to contain extremist Palestinians. "But," he adds, "as a British school boy's report card used to say, 'There's always room for improvement.' "

The author is careful to steer clear of endorsing either Benjamin Netanyahu or his Labor predecessors. The current hard line exists, he believes, "because Israelis watch TV, and see young Palestinians calling on Saddam Hussein to eliminate Israel."

Despite the fact that the Olso peace accords has faltered; despite impending "final status" talks on the future of Jerusalem; and despite the stress in Israeli society that Yitzhak Rabin's assassination continues to engender, Gilbert is forever the optimist, albeit in a cool, British way. "Something will be worked out," he says.

Leukemia fundraiser launched by patient

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When 29-year-old Michael Nepom discovered he had leukemia last May, he didn't give in to the temptation of despair — instead, he began to work with the Leukemia Research Fund to help others with the disease.

A tangible result of his efforts will be a golf tournament to benefit the LRF, which will be held at his own golf club, the Diamondback Golf Club at Leslie and Bloomington Rd., on June 19. The fee of $175 will include breakfast, green fees, a golf cart, and lunch.

Nepom himself will either be there for a very short time, or not at all, as he was scheduled for a bone marrow transplant last week (May 13), and would be in protective isolation for three weeks after that.

Nepom spoke to The CJN from his hospital room at Princess Margaret Hospital. He said that after a trip to Acapulco in May of 1997, he went to his doctor because he was feeling very tired and ill.

"My doctor told me that my white blood cell count was out of control. Soon, I was diagnosed with chronic myeloid leukemia."

Fortunately, Nepom was able to find a perfect match from the Red Cross Bone Marrow Registry. His transplant follows several sessions of total body radiation.

"He is quite a trooper — he is really hanging in there," said his wife, Shari, who works for UJA/Federation.

Not willing to "let the disease take over my life," Nepom said he and Shari decided to start their family. They are expecting a baby in September.

The golf tournament, which is now being looked after by Michael's sister Leslie Igel, has grown beyond what they expected. Some 150 golfers are planning to take part and Bob Rae, the national spokesperson for the Leukemia Research Fund, members of the Toronto Maple Leafs, and the media will be there.

Nepom hopes to make the tournament an annual event. He said that he would like next year's to focus on the need for Jews to be tested for the bone marrow registry.

CJC's 25th plenary

Next week, for three days beginning on May 24, several hundred delegates and observers from across Canada will be gathering in Winnipeg, the crossroad in central Canada between prairie west and industrial east, for the 25th plenary assembly of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

For nearly 80 years and continuing to this very day, Congress has had a rich history and deeply embedded tradition of speaking up for the Jews of Canada, lobbying the decision-makers of government and advocating on behalf of the minorities and "outcasts" in our midst. It is as close to a "parliament" of Canada's Jewish communities as today's communal organizational realities allow, one of the pre-eminent voices in an expanding chorus of representative Jewish spokespersons.

Over the past two decades, however, the burgeoning of local community federations and their integration into the wider North American Council of Jewish Federations has inevitably brought change to the scope and nature of CJC's mandate. But even if altered, that mandate is as vital today as it has ever been in the past.

Therefore, like the city in which the assembly is convening, the occasion, too, is a crossroad where Congress can reflect, reassess and reaffirm the importance of its work and "re-experience," as it were, the thrill of commitment to causes higher than the self.

The theme of the assembly is Jewish Roots Meet 21st Century Realities. It brings together scholars, experts, lay, professional and political leaders to share ideas, exchange views and stimulate discussion in some of the most pressing issues of the day.

As long as the Jews of Canada are concerned about the well being of their fellow human beings, here and abroad, Congress must participate in the unfolding of Canadian life, influencing policy, serving as a watchdog for the rights of the underdog, acting as a guardian of Jewish interests, and lending a voice to the searing imperatives of conscience. The 25th Congress plenary assembly is a perfect moment to be reminded of this.

To all the delegates and observers gathered in Winnipeg we extend our best wishes for a meaningful and rewarding conference.

Cleverly taking a page from the manual of public relations imaging and media manipulations, the Palestinian leadership decided to commemorate the date of Israel's founding, May 14, 1948, as al-nakba, the catastrophe.

Throughout Gaza and the West Bank and inside Israel itself, Palestinians demonstrated their contempt for Israel. Of course, violence ensued. Young children, mostly teenagers were the centrepiece of the protests, hurling their rocks, stones and molotov cocktails at the gun-toting Israeli soldiers. As of this writing, 10 Palestinians have been killed in the rioting.

The Palestinians have adopted a new tactic to try to influence western opinion, a tactic intent on creating different associations in the western mind for Israel's rebirth other than the "miraculous" triumph of the Jewish people. But this tactic, like others, will not succeed. Nor should we accede to or be indifferent to the Palestinian efforts at redefining history.

In May 1948, a war of extermination was launched against Israel. We must not feel defensive or apologetic that, merely five years after the crematoria of Europe, the Jews of Israel defeated the many armies and irregulars intent on their slaughter.

The real catastrophe for the Palestinian people was and remains the failure of their leadership, which even today, still talks about "all options being open" in their struggle against Israel.

York Jewish grads teach at all levels

In a May 7 article on Jewish teacher education at our sister university, McGill, you say that York's Jewish Teacher Education Program has limited itself to training elementary school teachers. That is not correct.

Among our alumni are high school and junior high teachers, as well as elementary teachers. Most of our students have prepared themselves for elementary teaching because there are more day schools and more job opportunities at that level. But we prepare teachers for all levels. Thanks to a generous endowment from the Israel Koschitzky Family Foundation, we are planning to expand our efforts in every area.

Readers may be interested to know that our alumni are teaching in schools across Canada, in the United States, in Israel, and of course, in Toronto. In the last two years, we have seen graduating students receive a Bronfman Yozma fellowship as well as a prestigious Wexner fellowship. At present, there are 30 students in our program, which is, in fact, the only program in North America to prepare teachers for certification both in general studies and in Jewish studies.

Reiterates criticism of Vatican Holocaust statement

I am obliged to respond to Alexander Epstein's letter of May 7 on the Vatican. I have no objection to criticism, provided it is valid and accurate.

Epstein in his letter reaffirms my principal complaint that the Catholic Church did not go far enough in its apology and exonerated Pope Pius XII. I agree with Epstein and with Rabbi Jordan Pearlson that the Vatican's report was not as forthcoming as one would hope after a so-called 10-year study.

Epstein is dead wrong, however, if he believes a cardinal who chooses to bless the Ukrainian Waffen SS Division is not under the direct control and authority of the Vatican.

Epstein is concerned that when criticism is levelled against the Catholic Church and the Ukrainians, this will jeopardize the lives of Jews who live in Ukraine. Surely with their new-found democracy and respect for human rights, neither the government nor the Church in Ukraine would tolerate anti-Semitism.

The United States is not a true friend of Israel

It's funny that the United States can possess such an obvious double standard and yet still be turned to for its input into the "progression" of the so-called "peace process."

While the United States calls itself a friend and ally of the State of Israel, it continues to side blatantly with the Palestinians.

You never see Madeleine Albright or Bill Clinton pressuring Yasser Arafat. It's Benjamin Netanyahu whom they pressure, always telling him to give away more land and to stop construction.

If a religious extremist sect in the United States threatened the government with violence if construction in any major city continued, surely the construction wouldn't stop. And the United States surely wouldn't give land away to prevent any violence.

How can the United States see all of the incitement and violence that occur daily in Israel, and demand that Netanyahu give away more land? The answer is actually quite simple: The present United States government is not a true ally or friend of Israel. If it was, it wouldn't make such absurd demands of the Israeli government in the face of a self-proclaimed enemy armed with terrorists.

Educate young non-Jews about Israel too

In regard to the editor's message (CJN, April 16), I think it is possible for the media to influence young Jewish attitudes about Israel, but to date, the media's impact has not been overwhelming. Most young Jews in Canada and elsewhere, myself included, have demonstrated a passion for Zionism and a keen commitment to supporting the State of Israel, despite the barrage of negative press.

I am most concerned about impressionable young non-Jews, who are more likely than young Jews to form an opinion of Israel based entirely on the information disseminated by the media. If these young non-Jews continue to be subjected to media reports that depict Israel as an empowered victimizer, they may be inclined to avoid relations with Israel, both personally and professionally.

The editor's suggestion to use education as the tool to limit the effect the media has on shaping young people's perceptions of Israel is a bright idea, but this education cannot simply be geared towards young Jews. Young non-Jews and Jews both need to be taught about Israel's accomplishments and humanitarian acts so that when they are in a position to assist Israel politically and economically, they will not hesitate to do so.

Jerusalem or Al-Qutz?

May 24, the 28th day of Iyar, is Yom Yerushalayim. To help commemorate this holiday, which marks the reunification of the city of Jerusalem during the Six Day War in 1967, the author briefly reflects upon the nature of the theological ties of Islam and of Judaism to the city.

By SARAH TAIEB CARLEN

* * *

"Thus saith the Lord God: 'This is Jerusalem! I have set her in the midst of the nations, and countries are round about her.'"

* * *

"Jerusalem, light of the world!"

The crowning achievement of King Solomon's reign was the building of the Temple, which, although small, took seven years to complete and became celebrated throughout the Near East for its beauty and splendor. Its remaining Western Wall, embellished by Herod hundreds of years later, is today the most sacred place on earth for Jews.

It was King David, however, who irreversibly linked Jerusalem to the Jewish religion, people and state. He deeply loved Jerusalem and sang his devotion to it in such verses as:

If I forget you, O Jerusalem,
let my right hand whither...
If I do not remember you,
If I do not set Jerusalem

Twenty-one centuries after Solomon, in his book, The Kuzari, Yehuda Halevi described the special place held by Jerusalem in the hearts and in the theology of all Jews. In the engaging discourse between the king of the Khazars and the Jew, Halevi explained the foundation of his faith: The enduring strength of the Jewish people is God given; and the source of its strength is the prophecy which will be realized when the Jews live in the Land of Israel, and especially in Jerusalem, speaking Hebrew, in freedom and dignity. The king asks: "But are you not like a dead body now?" And the Jew answers: "Not dead, but dangerously ill, yet with a firm faith that the great miracle will happen." By miracle, Halevi meant the end of exile and the ingathering of the Jews to the land of Israel and especially to Jerusalem.

Halevi was not the first to believe that one has to reside in Jerusalem in order for one's prayers to be heard. That idea had already been advanced by Saadia Gaon in the 10th century. There are endless such examples throughout their history of the Jews' love for and sanctification of Jerusalem.

Then the Muslims conquered Jerusalem. A simple, but important military detail exemplifies the lack of importance that Muslims traditionally attached to the city. Having just conquered Syria in the year 638 Omar, the second caliph, sent one of his young officers to occupy Jerusalem. He did not deem the trip to Jerusalem worthy of his efforts.

Neither did he deem it important to populate the city with Muslims. A Judeo-Arabic letter found in the Cairo geniza informs us that when the Jews asked Omar for his permission to return to the city, he granted it to them. He also implicitly acknowledged the Jews' right to the city. When he first saw the site of the Temple, which had become a garbage dump, he reportedly ordered the Byzantine Christian patriarch to crawl on his hands and knees through the filth and "clean this Jewish holy place." The Muslims, however, did have a special reverence for the Temple, because it was the first temple they had seen of a religion that did not use drawings, statues and sculptures to "represent the Unrepresentable."

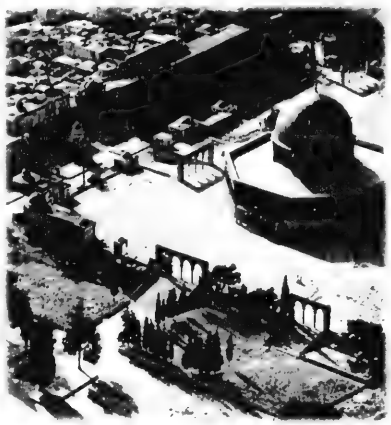
The behavior of Omar and a few of the subsequent Muslim rulers shows that not only was Islam free of any special attachment to Jerusalem, but it actually acknowledged the Jews' "ownership" and rights over it.

Moreover, many Muslims believe in the legend that explains why the Dome of the Rock is black. The holy color of Islam is green and the Dome of the Rock, built on the site of the Temple, was originally painted green. But it gradually began to tarnish and eventually became completely black. People interpreted this as a sign of mourning for the destruction of the Temple that had stood there before the Dome of the Rock was built on the holy spot.

For 400 years, before the Crusades, Islam ruled in Jerusalem. The majority of the city's population was Christian, although the Jews kept sneaking in and settling near the Kotel and between the Gate of Jehoshaphat and the Damascus Gate. Not many Muslims seemed to have been interested in settling in the city, even though it was under Muslim rule.

In his book Was hat Mohammed aus dem Judenthume aufgenommen? written in 1833, Abraham Geiger discusses the rabbinical and biblical themes of early Islamic religious texts, including the Koran. Of course, this is not a topic that most Muslims would consider discussing since they believe that just as God simply always was, so, too, with His book, the Koran. God certainly did not need help or inspiration from the Jews or the Christians.

Since the earliest times of Islam, the Muslims have not only denied any Jewish or Christian influence in the crystallization and formation of their religious doctrine, but they have also often made a strong point of distancing themselves from most Jewish or Christian symbols. One such symbol is Jerusalem.



The Temple Mount on which stands the Dome of the Rock, as photographed in June 1967.

Jafar Tabari, the famous ninth-century Muslim historian gives the following account of a conversation between Kab al-Ahbar, a Jew converted to Islam, and the caliph Omar, shortly after his conquest of Jerusalem:

Omar: Where do you think we should put our place of prayer?

Kab: By the Rock.

Omar: By God, Kab, you are following after Judaism. I saw you take off your sandals.

Kab: I wanted to feel the touch of it with my bare feet.

Omar: I saw you. But no... we were not commanded concerning the Rock, but we were commanded concerning the Kaba [in Mecca].

This dialogue shows how skeptical Omar was of Kab's conversion to Islam, since Kab still considered Jerusalem a holy city. At the time, Mecca, where Mohammed was born around 570, was the focal point of Muslim reverence and a place of pilgrimage towards which Muslims all over the world turned five times a day when they prayed. The other holy Muslim city was Medina, where the prophet had converted so many people to Islam before he died there in 632.

In subsequent years the tribe of Almohads added yet another holy city, Kairawan, in Tunisia, and they forbade Jews and Christians to live there lest it be desecrated by their impure presence.

Not only was Jerusalem not a holy city for Muslims, but its special place in the hearts and religious writings of the Jews made it quite unholy to the Muslims. As the famous Princeton scholar Bernard Lewis put it: "To venerate Jerusalem as a holy city is a sign of Jewish influence and therefore bad." Jerusalem is actually never explicitly mentioned in the Koran and this accounts for Muslim indifference and occasional dislike of the city through the ages.

This attitude changed, however. The reason might be found in this verse of the Koran, chapter 17, the Night Journey: "Glory be to Him who made His servant go by night from the Sacred Temple[2] to the farther Temple[3] whose surroundings We have blessed, that We might show him some of Our signs."

In my Penguin Classics English translation of the Koran, footnote 2 reads: "Of Mecca;" and footnote 3 reads: "Of Jerusalem (and thence to the throne of Allah, accompanied by the Angel Gabriel). Some Muslim commentators give a literal interpretation to this passage, others regard it as a vision."

Another factor that accounts for the change in attitude regarding Jerusalem is that 50 years after Omar, the caliph Abd el-Malik built the Dome of the Rock, which was completed in 691, on the Temple Mount to outdo the Christians and their Church of the Holy Sepulchre. He was also eager to settle his score with his rival, the caliph of Mecca and Medina, and he trumpeted the holiness of Jerusalem.

Malik's son, Caliph Waleed, built another mosque with a silver dome called Al-Aksa. The Muslims call the Temple Mount esplanade Haram esh-Sharif: Noble sanctuary.

In 1099, the European Christian Crusaders started their holy war in order to take it back from the Muslims. They massacred Jews and Muslims alike and created the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, which barred both Jews and Muslims from the city.

Jerusalem became a centre of religious learning under the Mamelukes in the 13th century. The Turkish sultan, Suleiman the Magnificent restored the city and built new walls around it that topped and surpassed the old Herodian walls.

Today, Muslims all over the world call the city Bet al-Makdas or, more often, Al-Qutz, The Holy One. Note the similarity to the Hebrew word Beit Hamikdash and to HaKadosh. However significant the tie between Islam and Jerusalem, it is a relatively recent one, and as we have seen, far less theologically centred than is often assumed.

On the other hand, ever since King David, Jerusalem has been at the very heart of Judaism's connection to the Land of Israel, and thankfully, Jerusalem is once again the capital of the State of Israel.

The challenge from the centre

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

Ronnie Milo's surprise announcement that he will run for prime minister in the next national elections has unsettled the volatile Israeli political scene even further.

Milo, officially a member of Likud and currently mayor of Tel Aviv, served in the Shamir government as minister of police. At 48, he is one of the young guard of the Likud, a peer of Ehud Olmert; Dan Meridor and Benny Begin. Over the years, he has moved from a hawkish, right-wing position, to a centrist, pragmatic one, in favor of the Oslo accords. Last year, he led an abortive "coup" against Benjamin Netanyahu, and since then, he harbors a personal and professional animosity towards the incumbent prime minister.

Milo's move was expected by some, especially in light of the serious challenge to him in Tel Aviv by Ron Huldai, a new, attractive, independent candidate for the mayoralty. According to this theory, better to lose on the national than the municipal stage.

Milo's move is more interesting in the context of the evolution of Israeli politics, on several counts. First, it represents yet another stage in the "privatization" of Israeli politics, even more apparent since the direct elections for prime minister were introduced in 1996. In the Israeli political scene of the 1990s, individuals count and parties do not. Ideology and history are in decline, and individual politicians cobble together candidates' lists based on short-term expediency and personal political agendas. Milo can run as head of a new independent list, composed potentially of Likud and Labor defectors and non-political business and academic leaders without a shared political or ideological past.

A second, interesting phenomenon is the fertile ground for Milo's move in the centre of the Israeli political spectrum today. The history of centrist parties in Israel is a checkered one. The historic divides between Labor and Likud, first on economic grounds, and after 1967, on political grounds, made it difficult for a coherent, centrist alternative to emerge.

Twice in Israel's political history, centrist parties had a significant showing in the Knesset. The first was in 1965, when Rafi, Ben-Gurion's breakaway faction that was formed largely to reflect his personal vendetta against rivals in his party, succeeded in the election. More significant was the success of the Democratic Movement for Change (DMC) in 1977. In that election, Labor lost its plurality for the first time. The DMC gave Begin's Herut the majority it required to govern, and with that, changed the face of Israeli politics forever by legitimizing Herut (Likud's predecessor) as a governing party.

Rafi, the DMC and various small centrist parties disappeared or broke down and were restructured repeatedly over the years.

Today, the situation is different. The differences between Likud and Labor are virtually non-existent on economic and social policy, and – in spite of current perceptions – are narrowing on the political question of the peace process. For some time, political analysts have identified the emergence of a new centrist party made up of former Labor and Likud politicians as a distinct possibility in the post-peace era in Israel. In fact, a number of politicians from both parties are presently working quietly on a joint platform for the centrist party of the future, in the hope that it may represent a majority in the Knesset and thereby limit the leverage of the haredi parties. The blurred ideological lines between Labor and Likud create a receptivity towards a soft centrist message for peace, coupled with a strong stance against religious coercion.

But the new space for a candidate in the centre is also created by the new electoral system. Direct elections of the prime minister have weakened the historic, large parties, and have allowed individuals to emerge as distinct entities. Already in 1992, David Levy, Netanyahu's rival for leadership of Likud, left Likud and declared his intention to run for prime minister. Netanyahu seduced him back into the fold at a heavy cost, because of the fear that Levy would force a second ballot that might work in Shimon Peres' favor.

Milo might well do the same. His list for the Knesset may not win too many seats, but in the race for the prime ministership, he will likely force a second ballot. It is highly unlikely that Milo would join Netanyahu, for whom he has little respect. In fact, he may well work in Ehud Barak's favor, especially among traditional Labor voters who are reluctant to support Barak personally. Because of this, Netanyahu will do all he can to discourage Milo's move.

The elections may be as much as two years away, and Milo has a long way to go. For an already-fragmented Likud, riddled with internal conflicts, his announcement poses yet another challenge.

Israel at 50 and the non-Jews

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

In a previous column, I addressed the links between Israel and Diaspora Jewry on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of Israel's independence. In another, I looked at issues of internal significance to Israel herself. In this column, I would like to reflect on Israel's place vis-a-vis the non-Jewish world.

Indeed, it seems I am not alone in reflecting on this. I have been struck by what seems like an inordinate amount of media attention to and analysis of this event. Most major newspapers that I have read have featured major articles, often a series of articles, dealing with current events in Israel as well as reviewing the high and low points of the past 50 years.

Perhaps it is true that "Jews are news." In a general sense, one could argue that media coverage of Israel is greater than might be warranted by numbers alone. Perhaps some of this may be due to large Jewish representation among readers of major periodicals or among working journalists. Perhaps it is due to the ongoing tensions in the Middle East and the easy access that journalists have in reporting from Israel compared to many other countries in the area or other "hot spots" in general. Perhaps it is due to fallout from a mood of introspection in Israel herself that may have spilled over into the non-Jewish world.

But there is more. I suspect there is an ongoing mystique about Jews, a subtext of the exotic in the way many non-Jews perceive Jews, Judaism, and by extension, Israel. There is nothing hostile about this.

Over a recent lunch at the McGill Faculty Club, a non-Jewish colleague recounted how she had been rather opposed to Israel's activities in the region until the Entebbe hostage rescue of 1976. She found herself awed and exhilarated by the event, which caused her to view Israel more favorably.

Many Jews find themselves serving as de facto ambassadors for Israel, called upon to either justify or explain various Israeli actions. I have never been bothered by that. While I try to be consistent and honest, on occasion I will fudge my "views" to make the best case for Israel, depending on the predilections of my audience. Not a terrible compromise…

Most North Americans indicate general support for Israel when asked such questions in national surveys, and there is no evidence that this support has been declining in the recent past. A fascination with Israel among better educated Canadians continues, but the elements of that fascination change with the times. Once it was curiosity about the kibbutz movement. Now it is as likely to be an interest in how Israel has coped with the massive influx of Soviet Jews, or how the tensions between religious and secular Jews will play themselves out, or the ongoing ups and downs of the peace process. From kibbutzniks to Haredim in Mea She'arim.

The fascination with Israel also seems linked to the increasing interest in the Holocaust (by Jews and non-Jews alike) over the past generation. The Montreal Gazette, as part of its extensive coverage of events related to Israel's 50th anniversary celebrations, included a lengthy analysis of the diversity of Jewish life in Montreal. But more revealing were a series of articles from a correspondent who was sent to accompany the Montreal contingent on the March of the Living tour of Poland and Israel.

Those reports served to establish for the non-Jewish readers of the newspaper the linkage between the despair of the Holocaust and the potential for redemption represented by Israel. This juxtaposition was also presented to non-Jewish moviegoers in the final emotional scene of the film Schindler's List. The linkage was also present, but perhaps in more subtle form, in the earlier movie Exodus. To the image of Israel as an innovative, interesting place has been grafted her role as guarantor of the future physical and religious survival of the Jewish people. And that is about right.

Talking to the animals

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The other day I read an article by the senior editor of a national U.S. magazine, and the part that attracted me was her experience with talking to animals.

The subject is of course not new. The Torah tells us of two creatures who spoke. One was the serpent who persuaded Eve to taste the forbidden fruit in the Garden of Eden. The other one was four-legged: Balaam's famous ass. She had a good look at a Divine being standing in her and Balaam's way and refused to go on. Her master thereupon beat her repeatedly and eventually the ass was empowered to speak to Balaam, rebuking him for his violence. In this case, the supernatural gift of speech was granted the animal because it could see what the human was unable to perceive – a potent lesson in humanity in addition to all other implications of the story.

Lately the subject has become current once again – not in any ways involving biblical tales, but reputing to be accurate descriptions of actual experiences with animals. Thus one book currently on the bestseller list informs us that the author speaks with horses, and the article to which I refer goes even further.

Author Cathy Madison approached the subject as a skeptic, but learned to adjust and concentrate her mind in such a fashion that she was able, not only to talk to animals, but also to see things from their perspective, if necessary.

Even though her experiences seem extraordinary and she is still somewhat skeptical, she concludes: "I now look at animals in a very different way. Science may not yet be able to define what we share, but whatever it is demands my respect. I no longer feel as separate and superior; I feel as if I've been introduced into a quiet, kindred society, where humans and animals cooperate and negotiate things like food, clothing and going for a walk."

Dog and cat lovers will not find this revolutionary, but others do. They believe that animals cannot think or talk, and they have difficulty dealing with subjects like communicating with dolphins and whales. From long experience, I know that the dogs we had did tell us their desires quite explicitly by the way they barked or moaned or whimpered. Of course they had to train us before we could understand them, but after awhile we learned.

In daily behavior animals and humans are pretty much alike: they eat, drink, sleep, have sexual drives, try to preserve what they have and especially their turf; they compete for power, love to be loved, and they all die. They are also different beyond the obvious: animals rarely eat more than they need or kill except to survive.

The bottom line is that, while human intelligence is indeed in most ways radically different from and superior to that of other creatures, nonetheless it would behoove us to feel a little less superior and a little more respectful of those who are not like us.

The article referred to appeared in the March/April edition of the Utne Reader.

The Kirshner File

Adolf Hitler – a historical survey

On April 30, 1945, one of the most evil men who ever lived placed a revolver to his head and blew out his brains. Fifty-three years on, popular interest in Adolf Hitler remains undimmed, judging by the avalanche of books examining his life.

By Sheldon Kirshner

Since 1936, when Konrad Heiden wrote the first substantial book about him, there have been more than 100 biographies on Hitler. John Lukacs, an American historian who describes Hitler as "the most extraordinary figure" of the 20th century, has studied these works. And in The Hitler of History (Alfred Knopf), he produces an intriguing but disturbing account of the evolution of our knowledge of him.

Lukacs claims that almost all of the serious biographies of Hitler have been written by German, British and American historians. German biographers, he adds, have made strenuous, earnest and honest efforts to come to terms with him, even though Germans have generally been loathe to think much about Hitler.

Having thoroughly immersed himself in the literature, Lukacs rates Joachim Fest's Adolf Hitler: A Biography (1973) and Ernst Deuerlein's Hitler: A Political Biography (1969) as the best works of the genre. He acknowledges that Allan Bullock's Hitler: A Study in Tyranny (1952) is the most commercially successful of all the biographies. But in the same breath, he dismisses it as "one dimensional" and "much too simple." This, surely, will be a surprise to readers who hold Bullock in high regard.

Before he launches into an analysis of Hitler and his policies, Lukacs feels duty bound to clear up a "grave misunderstanding." Hitler, far from having been mad, was responsible for his actions. And, making due allowances for the fluctuating frontiers between mental illness and sanity, he was a "normal" human being.

That being said, Lukacs makes three important points. The first is that his opponents underestimated his abilities. Hitler was in fact an effective statesman, a successful strategist and an awesomely respected leader who could size up an adversary. The second point is that Hitler did not usurp power. He became chancellor legally, constitutionally and democratically, a bleak truth Germans cannot rationalize away.

The third point is that the majority of Germans admired, perhaps loved, Hitler, even if they did not subscribe to National Socialism and join the Nazi party. "The German people believed in Hitler," Lukacs writes. "They put their faith in him."

Studying the trajectory of his career as a revolutionary and politician, Lukacs perceives several crucial turning points. The first was his arrival in Vienna in 1908. The second was his return to Munich in 1919. The third was his release from prison in 1924. The fourth was the diplomatic successes he enjoyed in 1938, his highwater mark. The fifth was his realization, in late 1941, that he could not win the war.

Hitler, had he suddenly died in 1938, would have been regarded as one of the greatest Germans in history, according to Fest. The statement is jarring, if not morally offensive, since Hitler's regime was mercilessly totalitarian and brutally anti-Semitic.

Yet Lukacs agrees with Fest's assessment. Hitler transformed Germany – humiliated by the Treaty of Versailles – into the greatest power in Europe without firing a shot. He brought prosperity and confidence to a nation crippled by the Depression.

"The thirties, after 1933, were sunny years for most Germans," Lukacs observes. "The concentration camps, the suppression of German Jews, the raucous vulgarity of Nazi propaganda were there, painfully sharp in the minds of an embittered minority; but how could they stack up against Hitler's creation of Prosperity, Greatness, Unity?"

It is a persuasive thesis, and Lukacs bolsters it with revealing statistics attesting to the mood of optimism that gripped Germany until World War II. There was a phenomenal rise in the birthrate and number of marriages, and the number of suicides dropped by 80 percent.

These trends were reduced to rubble by Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, which Lukacs calls Hitler's "supreme folly." Had Germany defeated the Soviet Union, he speculates, Britain and the United States would have had no alternative but to accommodate themselves to German supremacy in Europe.

Lukacs is on less firm ground when he compares Joseph Stalin's Soviet Union with Hitler's Germany. Leaving aside Jews, he claims that there was more individual and even political freedom in Germany than in the Soviet Union. The point, however, is belabored.

"We have no evidence of anti-Semitic utterances (private or public) by Hitler before his 31st birthday," Lukacs writes.

Reviewing the record, he reaches the conclusion that Hitler's anti-Jewish obsessions crystallized in 1918 and 1919, when, as a simple foot soldier, he witnessed the collapse of the German army and the subsequent rise and fall of the Munich Soviet republic.

Lukacs discounts Hitler's claim that he became "an absolute anti-Semite" in pre-World War I Vienna. Hitler, he argues, had Jewish acquaintances, perhaps even friends, in the youth hostel where he resided. In at least one instance, he enjoyed the hospitality of a cultured Jewish family. And he admired the musical talent of Gustav Mahler (the Jewish composer who, for opportunistic reasons, converted to Christianity.)

Lukacs concedes that, even in Vienna, Hitler struggled with the so-called Jewish problem. "But it seems that he felt no need to express these sentiments while they were still inchoate, before they had crystallized into a categorical idea or a powerful obsession."

As chancellor, Hitler's anti-Jewish policies evolved in stages. His original goal was expulsion: to force Jews out of Germany. Kristallnacht, in 1938, was designed with this purpose in mind. And yet Lukacs claims that it was not Hitler but principally Josef Goebbels, the propaganda minister, who organized this nation-wide pogrom. As circumstances changed, extermination became Hitler's ultimate objective.

We know that Hitler left no written order for this policy to be implemented. This was no mere oversight. Hitler did not want to know anything about the details of the Final Solution, reportedly refusing to read or to hear reports of what was being done to Jews.

"Hitler was not a sadist," Lukacs theorizes. "He took no sensual pleasure in the sufferings of his enemies or victims. Sadism is a sin of the flesh; Hitler's sins were those of the spirit."

It's a novel explanation, but is it plausible?

In closing, Lukacs deals with David Irving, the British researcher and writer who has written books about Nazi Germany and whose friends apparently include such Holocaust deniers as Ernst Zundel.

Irving's influence should not be underestimated, Lukacs warns. He commands a considerable readership, and certain respectable historians have praised his work.

Lukacs, though, is not one of them. As he puts it: "Few reviewers and critics of Irvings's books, including professional historians, have bothered to examine them carefully enough. Had they done so, they would have found that many of Irvings' references and quotations are not verifiable."

Bar mitzvah's meaning

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

As we reflect upon the history of the Jewish people in North America in the 20th century, we could describe it as a community that has maintained the tradition of Jewish life and at the same time, made many changes in the way of observing them. A good example is the different ways of celebrating bar mitzvah in contrast to the way it was celebrated in eastern Europe.

In the listing of the 613 mitzvot of the Torah, one will not find bar mitzvah, per se. However, there is a mitzvah to put on tfillin each day in keeping with the words found in the Shema: "You shall bind them as a sign upon your hand and frontlets between your eyes."

Our sages felt that at the age of 13, a youngster would be mature enough to understand the importance of tfillin and of fulfilling the adult responsibilities of observing the mitzvot of the Torah. So, in reality, to mark the transition from childhood to adult responsibility, all the bar mitzvah boy really has to do is put on the tfillin and do so for the rest of his life. He is also now eligible to be counted in a minyan, receive honors and observe the mitzvot of the Torah.

How did it become such an important family milestone and cause for great celebration? At the age of 13, the youngster was eligible to have an aliyah and recite the blessings over the Torah,which could only be done in the synagogue. Spontaneously in eastern Europe some families decided to invite a few relatives and friends to the synagogue to join them for services and a kiddush or l'chaim afterwards.

Tradition and change suggest that while the bar mitzvah boy still has the aliyah in North America, there has been greater emphasis on Haftorah and Torah reading. Also the party atmosphere and manner of celebrating the Shabbat lunch or evening dinner parties is certainly a great change.

As a rabbi, I have always taken pleasure in sharing in the nachas of joining families in this special milestone. However, it is fair to state that often I have wondered if the bar mitzvah boy and his family live up to the real purpose of the celebration.

In all my years in the rabbinate, I have tried to impart the basic message to them. Obviously, it begins with the child seeing mitzvot observed in the home enhanced by appropriate Jewish education.

Following the joy and nachas of the celebration, it is necessary for follow-up afterwards, which means the putting on of tfillin every day and the continuous involvement in Jewish education, synagogue attendance and participation in Jewish activities. In addition, as the words of the Shema suggest, it should bring about the binding relationship to Jewish tradition and the Almighty for life.

As we come to the end of the 20th century, every bar mitzvah celebrant must see himself as helping in the goal of ensuring continuity of Jewish life. Tfillin are placed on the arm near the heart and on the head, for these are the inspiring forces of Jewish emotion and intellect. In addition, Jewish education in teenage and young adult life will serve as a means of informing and challenging the intellect to a mature appreciation of Torah and mitzvot.

Thus, while changes have been made in North American celebrations, they must remain tied to the hope that the bar mitzvah boy will understand the real message of bar mitzvah.

The coming holiday of Shavuot reminds us that at Sinai the Jewish people in that generation and through all generations became bar mitzvah when our ancestors made commitment to Judaism by saying Na'ase v'nishma. "We will observe and listen."

Keeping client confidentiality

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

Most professions are regulated by a code of ethics that practitioners are bound to follow. Amongst the basic tenets are those of client confidentiality. While it is only in the legal and medical professions that these rights are enshrined in law, all professions mandate some form of client secrecy. Even when not legally bound, many professionals will risk personal harm rather than betray a confidence. Many a journalist has gone to jail rather than reveal their sources of information.

Jewish law limits what information may be revealed not only by professionals but by all people. Unless granted explicit permission otherwise, it is to be assumed that any information that is revealed to you must be held in strict confidence. Even when granted permission to "speak," one may not say anything that could reflect poorly on another. The only exception is when the information revealed will protect another person from harm. In such an instance, the information must be revealed, even if it was told to you in strict confidence. Examples would include informing someone about the unsavory practices of the person with whom he is considering entering into a business deal, or letting a prospective marriage partner know about serious character flaws of their potential mate.

A Jewish professional following the dictates of Halachah can easily find himself in a quandary. A client has given him or her – in confidence – information that, if revealed, could prevent a loss to a third party. Perhaps a defendant admitted to his lawyer that he actually did murder the deceased even though a not guilty plea has been entered. What must a G-d fearing professional do in such circumstances?

As a general rule, Jewish law states that in order to prevent violation of a negative command, one must forfeit all of one's monetary possessions. Hence one must give up one's job rather than work on the Shabbat. On the other hand, one is not obligated to, nor is one even allowed to, spend more than 20 percent on the performance of a positive mitzvah. This is why the mitzvah of tzedakah is limited to a maximum of one-fifth of one's income.

At first glance, it would appear that a Jewish professional would have to reveal confidential information if potential harm would thereby be avoided: To remain silent would be in violation of the (negative) biblical prohibition of Lo ta'amod al dam reacha – that one may not stand idly by while harm befalls others.

Modern day authorities cite two compelling reasons, one technical and one "ideological," to allow professionals to abide by their code of ethics, even though it might otherwise entail violation of the aforementioned law.

While no amount of money can justify violation of negative commandments, this only applies, says the Chatam Sofer (foremost authority of 19th-century Hungarian Jewry), when you actively violate the law, such as by eating non-kosher food.

Passive violation, however, as is the case when withholding information, also falls under the 20 percent guidelines. It is obvious that a professional who reveals confidential information risks putting his entire career – not to mention possible loss of licence – in jeopardy. Faced with possible loss of one's livelihood, Jewish law would allow one to remain quiet, as this only entails passive violation of the law.

There is however, an additional factor at play, irrespective of any monetary loss. Jewish law at times allows for societal needs to override the personal needs of an individual. Hence the Talmud rules that a hostage may not be redeemed for an exorbitant ransom – according to many authorities even if his life will be forfeited – to do so would encourage additional hostage taking.

Absolute client confidentiality, while potentially harming individuals in any particular case, seems to offer a greater benefit to society as a whole. Without it people would think twice before revealing their innermost thoughts to a mental health professional or even confiding in their lawyers. The benefits that flow to society from having professionals bound by a strict code of ethics makes absolute confidentiality a must.

Learn to respect differences

By SHIRA KOGUT

Not many of you know what it is like to be an overweight teenager. Well allow me to give you a brief look into my life. I've been laughed at, pointed at and made fun of more often than I can remember. I've gone from one diet to the next since I was 6 years old. I can't even recall how many times I've heard, "You know, Shira, you'd be so pretty if you lost 20 pounds."

People I don't even know have made fun of me. Imagine sitting there on vacation, just enjoying the peace and quiet of the Grand Canyon, and hearing two guys say aloud, "God look at her. She's so disgusting," while they are looking and pointing your way. It's rude and embarrassing, but it has happened to me.

No matter how many times things like that happen, I'm always hurt by it. Constant mockery because you have a flaw is something you never really get used to.

I always say to myself, "Shrug it off. You don't know them. Who cares what they think?" But the truth is I do care. It hurts me inside to know that all someone sees when they look at me is fat. I understand that when you look at a person for the first time, all you notice is how they look. But you should not judge a person by their looks. And if you do, at least have the common courtesy to keep it to yourself.

In the 1930s and '40s, a size 16 was considered beautiful. Marilyn Monroe, one of the most glamorous actresses to ever grace Hollywood,was a size 16. Now a size 4 is what's beautiful. How many women can fit into a size 4 while still being healthy and eating three proper meals a day? Not many; and I've seen lots of girls try. Not all women have the same build. I don't understand why we can't accept each other no matter what we look like.

I'm sick of being an outcast in a society that will never accept me for who I am, but only for what I look like. After all my struggling and trying to fit in, I've decided that I don't want to be a member of our judgmental society. Even if I lost weight, people would find something else to make fun of.

Because of my experiences, I have learned something very important: No matter what your weight, height, skin color, religion, gender, or any other characteristic you might have, be proud of who you are and where you've come from.

I'm proud to be an honest, intelligent, friendly perfectionist who just happens to be overweight. If a person can't look past my weight, then that is their loss. My true friends like me for who I am.

It is very difficult sometimes not to judge by outward appearances. Everyone does it and I will be the first to admit that sometimes my tongue slips before I can catch it. The important thing to remember is that you should always apologize, because you might really be hurting someone's feelings. We've all been hurt before. Why would we want to inflict that emotional pain on someone else?

I guess you can see why I disagree with Groucho Marx when he said, "I don't want to belong to any club that will accept me as a member." I don't want to belong to any club that won't accept me as a member, because they aren't worth my time.

I didn't write this as a pity speech. I wrote it to prove a point. My point is that we have to respect each other and our differences. When you make fun of someone because of a flaw, you can really hurt them. You might think it's a joke, but sometimes it's just not funny. I don't want to be part of a club if they won't accept me, because if they don't accept me, that means that they don't respect me.

If we could all respect each other and our differences, we wouldn't have any clubs or divisions, but until that day, I don't want to belong to any club that won't accept me for who I am.

Good eats for Shavuot

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

One countdown is over. Another continues.

A few weeks ago, we completed our countdown to Israel's 50th anniversary. But we are still in the middle of a far more ancient countdown as we count 50 days from Passover to Shavuot. (Project Genesis has an interesting overview of the sefirat Ha'omer period [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/omer/] and the Jewish Communications Network does a good job with Shavuot [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/shavuot/index.htm].)

Shavuot, of course, marks the giving of the Torah at Mt. Sinai. But as with all the Jewish holidays, food plays a crucial role both historically and in terms of what we find on our dinner plates on Shavuot. Today, I want to concentrate on the foods associated with this holiday and the bounty of information that you can find on the Jewish Highway.

While the Land of Israel is blessed with many fruits, seven of them had special status as seen in the Seven Species Gallery [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/shavuot/sevenspe.htm]. These were the first fruits brought to the Temple once a year at Shavuot, and offered to God. As such, they symbolize the Land of Israel and the close links of the Jewish people with that land. "God your Lord is bringing you to a good land...of wheat, barley, grapes, figs and pomegranates, a land of oil, olives and honey." (Deut 8:89 [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/deuteron/torah/08060807.htm].

Actually, that honey refers to the sweet fruit of the date palm tree. For biblical references and a recipe for a date ring, see Let's Make a Date [http://www.bridgesforpeace.com/dfjfood997.htm].

For an interesting history of the date palm and some recipes, see Desert Date Delights [http://www.desertusa.com/magnov97/dates/nov_date.html].

Unlike the rest of the festivals, where meat gets the starring role, Shavuot has a very strong tie to dairy foods. Tradition has it that the laws of kashrut were given at Mount Sinai. So in anticipation, the Israelites refrained from eating meat and ate dairy. And a lot of cheesecake! [http://www.holidays.net/shavuot/legend.htm]

If you are looking for something a bit different, try Shirberenj, a traditional Persian Shavuot rice pudding with cardamom and cinnamon [http://home.bc.rogers.wave.ca/sburton/bethhamidrash/rice.htm]. And thanks to the women of Silver Spring, Md.'s Southeast Hebrew Congregation, you can help yourself to a Lemon Pasta with Asparagus and Pine Nuts and to an Eggplant Parmigiana [http://con2inc.com/pub/sehc/recipes.html].

Do you have your own favorite dairy recipe? Join the Jewishfamily.com dairy recipe swap [http://shamash.org/jfl/holidays/shavuot.htm]. Karen Rubinstein loves her Aunt Mikki's Spinach Lasagna because it's low fat, as is Shirley Olishansky's Delicious Lowfat Kugel à la Pineapple. For some traditional recipes for blintzes and yes, cheesecake, take a look at Shavuot Summer Feasting [http://www.jcn18.com/newstand/MARKS/blintzes.htm].

Israel, of course, is referred to as a land flowing with milk and honey. If you would like to prepare a dish using both those ingredients, you can whip up some Date Cheddar Scones [http://www.californiadates.org/recipe.htm] and wash them down with a Milk and Honey High Protein Drink [http://www.deter.com/flora/mxp/noalco/52.html]. That is, if you still have room.

Next week, the Shavuot countdown continues.

Brampton Reform congregation celebrating its 20th anniversary

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Brampton's Har Tikvah

BRAMPTON — Har Tikvah, a Reform congregation with a membership of about 50 families, is gearing up for its 20th anniversary.

Lawrie Bloom, a past president of the congregation and a co-ordinator of the celebration, says he has sent out about 100 invitations, including to old members, to attend a weekend service and dinner dance.

The congregation, originally called the North Peel Jewish Association, started up with six families as a social, cultural and educational group. Its first major event was a Chanukah party.

"A huge crowd showed up – we did not know there were so many Jews in the area," recalls Bloom.

In 1983, when it became a congregation ,the group changed its name and bought an old church. "We have been there ever since," says Bloom.

Har Tikvah also runs a Hebrew school with 50 students from pre-school to post bar and bat mitzvah age.

Synagogue services run twice a month, led by student rabbis from Hebrew Union College in New York.

The success of the congregation, says Bloom, is due to the fact that "[Many Jews] in the area are looking for a facility close to home. We are also a motivated group of people and there is lots of volunteer support."

All teachers at the Hebrew school, says Bloom, are members of the congregation and post bar and bat mitzvah students generally become assistant teachers.

"We run a very inexpensive operation. We do everything ourselves. There is volunteer lay leadership, cantors, youth group leaders and a number of volunteer teachers."

For seven years, Har Tikvah has sponsored the Israel pavilion at the area's annual Carabram, and has won several awards for entertainment, atmosphere and decorations.

"We have music, dancing, Israeli foods, a marketplace and Israeli displays. In three days last year, over 8,000 people visited the pavilion."

This year's Carabram is running July 10, 11 and 12.

Spirituality in the Workplace

TORONTO — The breakdown of old assumptions about work, coupled with a renewed, pre-millennial spiritual awakening, have resulted in a two-day conference on Spirituality in the Workplace, to take place at the University of Toronto, May 27-29.

The conference, the first of its kind in Canada, will bring together some 60 experts on business ethics, management, leadership, the workplace, as well as several clergy people, including rabbis, for a wide-ranging look at the nature of work and the quality of today's work environment.

Keynote speaker will be Martin Rutte, a former Hamiltonian who co-authored Chicken Soup for the Soul at Work, which has sold over 600,000 copies in North America.

Rutte told The CJN from his home in Santa Fe, N.M. that old assumptions like life-long job security have been replaced by harsh realities, like downsizing.

The conference will explore how managers and employees can bring compassion, integrity, respect and vision back to the workplace.

The conference is expected to draw over 1,000 professionals and managers from across Canada and the United States.

For details, call 416-482-9175.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The sounds of the Viennese waltz filled the dining room in the Castleview Witchwood Towers, where residents, nurses and social work staff gathered to celebrate Malvine Lermer's 100th birthday.

Among the well-wishers at the party at the seniors' home, organized by Lermer's only child, Trudy Lester, were Lermer's four grandchildren, six great-grandchildren, and close family friends and relatives.

The Vienna-born Lermer, who suffers from Alzheimer disease, has been a resident of Castleview Witchwood Towers for seven years, said Lester.

It was extremely difficult for her to place her mother in a home, she said, because the two had lived together for most of her life.

"Who lives with a mother for 62 years? She almost went on the honeymoon," Lester said. "It was very traumatic to put her in a home...We had never separated.

"She lost her husband – my father – when I was 12. Her life was totally dedicated to me...She was only concerned for my safety and happiness."

Their story of survival began in Romania, where they had relocated from Vienna in 1934. When the Russians occupied Romania in 1940, they confiscated her father's property, and he was forced to move the family from its large city home to a shack on a country farm.

Lester said she last saw her father in 1940, shortly after he was arrested by the Russians for being a capitalist. After the Nazi occupation of Romania, she and her mother were persecuted for being Jewish.

Father arrested by Russians

They escaped deportation because they had German passports. Although the passports indicated they were Jewish, the Romanians helping the Nazis to round up Jews were unable to read German, Lester said. "In a very strange way, the swastika saved us."

She said her mother sold all her jewelry to secure two places on a boat bound for Palestine in 1942. The boat capsized off the coast of Turkey, but all the passengers were rescued by the Turkish army.

Lermer would not allow herself to be rescued until she was sure her daughter was safe, Lester said.

After walking for three months in Turkey, stateless and without passports, all passengers of the ship were sent to Cyprus, where they spent the rest of the war. There Lester met her future husband, a passenger on another boat, who went to Palestine with her and her mother after the war and then on to Canada with them.

Vatican helped Nazis escape justice

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An expert on the connections between chivalric orders and the Catholic Church recently delivered a highly critical appraisal of the Church, arguing the Vatican aided Nazis escape justice following World War II and that it bestowed its blessing on the veterans of an SS division as recently as 1993.

The blessing by Cardinal Lubachivsky, Archbishop-Major of the Catholic Uniate See of Lviv, upon veterans of the SS Galicia Division suggests an attempt to rewrite history, said Michael Steeler, a member of several chivalric orders.

"Evidence suggests the Vatican aims to whitewash not only the record of the Church in providing the fertile ground in which Nazism grew, but also the history of 'Christian' Europe, which owes so much to the Catholic Church," he told about 30 people attending a luncheon sponsored by the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada (JCREFC).

"In a spirit of general forgiving and forgetting, the Catholic Church plans to celebrate the year 2000 with the page of history neatly turned on the slaughter of the Crusades, the torture and deaths of the Inquisition, the genocide of native peoples of the newly discovered America and other horrendous events, including the Holocaust and the Vatican's role in it," Steeler said.

Steeler prefaced his remarks by playing a videotape of a 1994 60 Minutes report entitled The Ugly Face of Freedom, which examined political conditions in western Ukraine. The documentary examined a revival of ultra-nationalism that included crude anti-Semitism and rehabilitation of the SS Galicia Division. In 1993, veterans of the division celebrated its 50th anniversary by marching in Lviv. They were then blessed by Cardinal Lubachivsky as they had been 50 years before by Archbishop Szepticky.

Steeler, 69, said he was stunned to learn a Cardinal of the Church had blessed the division.

The division was drawn from Ukrainian police which had, on its own initiative, murdered thousands of Jews before the Nazi Holocaust began and which later collaborated with the Nazis in wiping out entire Jewish communities, Steeler said.

"How could this Cardinal, acting under the authority of a Pope who claims to make improving his Church's relations with Jews a main goal of his papacy, promote Holocaust denial with impunity?" Steeler asked.

"Lubachivsky's blessing was only one step in a determined effort to sanitize the reputation of the SS," he later replied.

Tracing the unit's history, Steeler said during the war, Pope Pius XII "saw creation of this unit as key to realizing his dream of re-establishing a Habsburg imperial monarchy to rule Catholic states stretching from the Baltic to the Black Sea...To encourage his Ukrainian flock to cooperate with the Nazis by volunteering for service, the Pope authorized Archbishop Szepticky to bestow the Church's blessing on the division at its founding...In consequence, complete with Uniate Catholic chaplains, the Galicia Division of the Waffen-SS was widely recognized as 'the Catholic Army of the Ukraine.'"

Quoting books like Blowback, Unholy Trinity and The Beast Reawakens as well as U.S. News and World Report, Steeler said after the war the Vatican "Ratlines conspiracy" aided in the movement of illegal immigrants, including 70,000 Nazi war criminals such as Josef Mengele, Auschwitz's Angel of Death.

Religious orders and members of the Knights of Malta aided in the effort, while the Maltese Knights were also involved in gathering intelligence, he said.

Steeler said that following "mea culpas" from the French and other Catholic Churches in Europe, "there is a growing demand for the Pope to issue an explicit mea culpa for the role of the Church itself, in preparing the ground for the Holocaust and collaborating with the Nazis both during and after World War II."

(Despite the Vatican's statement on the Shoah, released in mid-March, that denounces anti-Semitism and the Holocaust, the Church was criticized for failing to acknowledge its role in creating a climate of anti-Semitism and for failing to speak out more forcefully against Nazi atrocities.)

Steeler pointed out that Pope Pius XII never excommunicated Adolf Hitler or Mengele, who were both Catholics.

Meili a pariah in Switzerland

Fagan, a New York lawyer who represents some 30,000 U.S. Holocaust survivors in a class action lawsuit against Swiss banks. Fagan persuaded Meili to testify before the U.S. Senate's banking committee, which was examining links between Swiss banks and the Nazis.

A Swiss newspaper poll at the time showed that more than half of his countrymen felt Meili had harmed Switzerland. He was a pariah.

It was then Meili knew he had to leave his homeland.

Last August, President Bill Clinton signed Meili's application for permanent U.S. residency for him and his family, making him, in effect, a Swiss refugee. He received a little financial help and dozens of job offers, including one from World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman.

Today, Meili works as a security guard in New York and lives rent-free thanks to an anonymous Jewish benefactor.

"But the Swiss know where I am," he said, adding he still gets threats he regards as "serious."

But Meili isn't sitting still. He's on a mission to find the rightful owners or heirs to the properties listed on the documents he rescued. He's been to Berlin several times to do research.

He showed The CJN a list of what he said were 60 Berlin addresses, with the precise date the Nazis took them over after expelling their Jewish owners (the documents say the homes were "evacuated"), as well as the names of the Swiss banks that assumed title to the properties. The papers supposedly cover the period 1933 to 1939.

He is also suing Swiss banks for $2.5 billion. The action would only come into force, explained his lawyer, should Switzerland enact its so-called Solidarity Fund of compensation for Holocaust victims' heirs. The money would come from the sale of Swiss gold reserves. Meili feels compensation should come from the banks, not the Swiss taxpayer.

Fagan says copies Meili made of the documents are "his insurance policy. If anything happens to him, that triggers [the copies'] release, and not to the banks. As long as they exist, he's safe."

Fagan bluntly said he "had to get to [Meili] before they killed him. People have been killed for less.

"The minute he gets closer to the truth, the banks will come and make him an offer. They will do anything to shut him up."

But Fagan doubts his client can be bought. "He cannot be stopped. He's the nicest loose cannon I know."

In the meantime, Meili says his siblings and parents back in Switzerland "are having a hard time" because of his plight.

What motivated him?

"I'm a Christian. The Bible says when you do something good for the Jewish people, the Lord will bless you."

Ultimately, the relevance of the documents will be determined by the commission of Swiss historians studying the country's war-era role.

But for Meili, the documents belong to the Jewish people.

"I did this for you," he told the Hadassah luncheon. "This stuff belongs to you."

Education linked to identity

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The value of an education can be measured to a great extent by the opportunities it provides students to begin to settle questions of their identity, said Avi Bernstein-Nahar, speaking at the annual Ray D. Wolfe Memorial Lecture held recently at University College, University of Toronto (U of T).

In his scholarly lecture titled Accounting for Modern Jewish Identity: Hermann Cohen and Liberal Education Today, Bernstein-Nahar said that the view of education found in the writings of German Jewish philosopher Hermann Cohen (1842-1918) is the perspective which has found articulate voice in contemporary debate about liberal education.

Bernstein-Nahar, who is completing his Ray. D. Wolfe Fellowship in Jewish studies at U of T, recently defended his dissertation at Stanford University. He studied at Brown University graduating magna cum laude and at Princeton University; he was also a Lady Davis Research Fellow at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Bernstein-Nahar concurred with Cohen's conclusions that a Jewish studies curriculum should be devoted to exposing students to Jewish traditions, particularly literary ones.

As well, the curriculum should cultivate in students exegetical skills and the capacity to argue persuasively about what tradition means.

Cohen's views of modern Jewish identity, said Bernstein-Nahar, are for the student to "seek his or her origins with the intent of discerning his or her distinctive purposes – those aims of life most worthy of pursuit." To understand a person's distinctive purposes is to grasp his or her identity.

Therefore, higher education should shape the self-understanding of students, forming character and instilling virtue, said Bernstein-Nahar.

The origins of Jewish identity, or any identity, according to Cohen, reside in cultural and literary traditions, including religious traditions. In Cohen's liberal interpretation of Judaism, he was not referring to rabbinic traditions, which he believed were no longer normative in a comprehensive way, said Bernstein-Nahar.

Cohen identified "tradition" as "ethical monotheism and prophetic Judaism" – a cultural, literary and religious tradition that should be normative for all modern Jews. The practice of this tradition emphasizing moral teachings, Cohen hoped, would be a by-product of study of classical Jewish texts and the observance of many of the mitzvot, said Bernstein-Nahar.

He said that Cohen suggests that higher education should address questions of identity, answering: Who am I? Where do I belong? Am I really who I ought to be?

The implications for liberal education today, he noted, flow from Cohen's thought of coupling tradition and modernism. He noted that Cohen has influenced all the major branches of Judaism – Reconstructionist, Reform, Conservative and Orthodox thinking.

Cohen's legacy for liberal education, said Bernstein-Nahar, is that traditions inform us of who we are insofar as they contain our distinctive purposes.

Students exploring Jewish identity might, as an example study any number of traditions of the Zohar or Chassidism, or more to Cohen's liking, the legal traditions of Maimonides' Mishnah Torah.

Jewish studies have "blossomed" in every major university in North America, he said. "And their courses are beginning to be recognized as an integral part of any curriculum for liberal education. It remains to be seen whether this recent development can have a significant impact on the self-understanding of Jewish students."

David Novak, director of the Jewish Studies Program at U of T, said that the fellowship was established to enable a young scholar to teach, continue with research and interact with members of the Jewish Studies Program for one year.

Jewish veterans mark Legion's 65th anniversary

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Members of the General Wingate Branch No. 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion reunited with old friends at a recent dinner dance to mark the legion's 65th anniversary.

Some 90 people attended the celebration which also included the installation of the new executive officers and board members, as well as a speech by Metro city councillor Norm Gardner.

Gardner, a member of both the Canadian Army Militia and the Wingate Branch of the Canadian legion paid tribute to Jewish war veterans, noting that during World War II, the Jewish community had the largest percentage of enlisted men of any group in Canada.

According to statistics, 17,000 Jewish men and women out of a total Jewish population of 75,000 served in the army, air force and navy during World War II, he said. "I'm proud of the Jewish contribution to the armed forces."

Senior representatives from the Royal Canadian Legion were on hand for the installation ceremony of the Wingate branch officers including Sam Romberg, president; Saul Raibmon, first vice-president; Adoph Goldberg, second vice-president; and Al Labovitch secretary treasurer.

Outside the main room, acting Sergeant at Arms Lionel Mernick assembled these men along with six members of the executive board of the Wingate branch – Oscar Adler, Reuben Cherry, Harold Kates, Sam Ross, Reva Wolfson and Murray Jacobs, and led them as they marched back into the room for their formal installation.

Jacobs, who chaired the event, and was assisted in the planning and organization by his wife Millie, said they were pleased with the turn out.

"We had members there who hadn't been able to get out to meetings, Millie said. "These men deserve to be celebrated."

The Toronto-born Jacobs who became an acting sergeant major by the end of the war, enlisted in the army in 1942 and immediately volunteered to go overseas because he "felt an obligation to help our fellow Jewish brothers." He landed in France, he said, four days after D-Day making his way through Europe and helping to liberate Holland.

He was one of 25 Wingate branch members who, along with their wives, were entertained by the Dutch government for 12 days at celebrations marking the 50th anniversary of the commemoration of the liberation of the Netherlands in 1995.

Romberg, who enlisted in the army in 1940 and went overseas with the tank core in 1941, led the General Wingate section of the parade in Holland on the 1995 trip. "It was heart rending the way the people took us in their arms, he said.

"We were carrying the Canadian, Israeli, and branch flags. When a section of the crowd saw the Magen David they broke out singing Havah Nahgilah. It just sort of tore at our hearts."

He said the legion branch can be traced back to the Jewish branch 256 of the Great War Association formed in the early '20s. In 1926, branch 256 became part of the British Empire Service League.

In 1934 the Jewish branch became a charter member of the Royal Canadian Legion, changing its name in 1950 to honor British Major General Orde Charles Wingate, a non-Jew, who served in Palestine and gave significant support to the Zionist cause in the mid '30s.

The Wingate branch does a lot of fundraising and volunteer work, said Romberg. It raised the money to build and maintain the Cenotaph in Mt. Sinai Memorial Park, and it is also active in helping the 35 Jewish veterans in the chronic care wing of Sunnybrook Health Science Centre.

Legion members do friendly visiting, run bingo nights and help with Shabbat services at the chapel, as well as with holiday celebrations including the annual seder for the ailing veterans.

New JIAS rep for Halifax

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Boris Tzinman knows what he went through as a refugee immigrant to Canada.

And the Halifax man wants to ensure other people have as smooth a transition as he did 18 years ago.

A successful engineer and businessman, the 43-year-old native of Riga, Latvia, is the new JIAS representative in Atlantic Canada, a volunteer position he says he'll relish.

"When I came, I didn't know what I needed, who to register with, how to integrate into the community. But my brother and I were single, we were outgoing and we reached out. The people of Halifax invited us to their homes and made us welcome. I want to do the same for others trying to make their way in Canada."

Tzinman is the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) representative on the JIAS national board. AJC has requested more immigration of Jews into the region and it's Tzinman's function to prepare the volunteer committee infrastructure to make it happen.

"As an immigrant myself, I have an advantage because I know what they need," said Tzinman. He recently converted a computer keyboard to Russian so he can communicate with Eastern European prospects. He has already corresponded with a woman in southern Russia interested in migrating to Canada.

"I just want to do what I can to make it easier for them to settle and feel as comfortable as I am."

New Bonds director faces higher quota challenges

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — When Geoffrey Druker became State of Israel Bonds city director for Vancouver in February, he faced more than the normal challenges that come with starting a new job: Bonds' headquarters had just asked for increases of 20 percent.

The loan guarantees that Israel has been receiving from the United States government to help it absorb Russian immigrants ends this year. Israel needs to raise an additional $3 billion, of which State of Israel Bonds needs to come up with $1 billion, 20 percent higher than in recent years.

Vancouver is equal to the challenge, Druker said. "Vancouver has been a loyal Bonds supporter over the years. I'm sure we'll do our share to help raise the extra money that Israel needs."

Druker, who is also a partner in a Vancouver company that imports mobility and rehabilitation equipment from Israel, said there were two main reasons that he chose to join Bonds.

"First, I like Bonds because they are an investment," he explained. "When people buy State of Israel Bonds, they're making an investment which pays a good financial return; they're not giving to charity. Second, because I grew up in Israel, I feel a specialty affinity to State of Israel Bonds. Over the years they have done a lot to build up the country's infrastructure."

Infrastructure projects

Current infrastructure projects include the new north-south Cross-Israel Highway, job creation and immigrant absorption projects, energy projects and industrial parks.

Druker, who was born in 1956 in Johannesburg, South Africa, made aliyah in 1964 with his parents and two younger brothers. They settled in Kfar Daniel, a moshav which lies half-way between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

After completing his compulsory three-year hitch in the Israel Defence Forces, Druker enrolled in the Israel Institute of Technology (Technion) in Haifa, where he earned a bachelor of science degree in industrial engineering.

In 1981, he began work as an industrial engineer in the organization and methods/operation research division of El Al, which acts as an internal consultant to Israel's national airline. He worked for El Al in Tel Aviv until 1987 and at the same time earned a master of business administration degree at the University of Tel Aviv and served two stints in the reserve infantry during the 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

In 1987, while visiting relatives in Edmonton, Druker met Rozanne Kipnes. In 1988, he left Tel Aviv and moved to Vancouver, where he and Kipnes married and still live today. Druker, his wife, who is director of real estate development and construction for Future Shop, and their two daughters, Shira, 3½ years old, and Aria, one month, live in suburban Richmond.

Since coming to the Lower Mainland, Druker has been active in Jewish community affairs. He has been president and has sat on the board of directors of the Canadian Zionist Federation, Pacific region, for two years. In 1996, he received the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's Young Leader Award.

Druker says his office is planning a number of promotional special events to enable Bonds to meet its quota. The events include sending a Vancouver honoree to the annual Elie Wiesel State of Israel Bonds dinner in November, and a concert featuring a "world class Jewish entertainer" to honor the young leaders of Vancouver.

Teen has winning way with words

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Michael Kives has a winning way with words.

The Grade 11 student at St. John's-Ravenscourt (SJR) School has just completed another successful year on the international debating circuit.

St. John's-Ravenscourt private school was originally Anglican, but it has for many years been open to everyone, and a growing percentage of its students are Jewish.

The school is noted internationally for its debating program, co-ordinated by teacher John Robinson.

Kives, who entered SJR in primary school, began his debating activities in Grade 8, the first year students are eligible.

By the end of Grade 8 he qualified for the national competition in Halifax. He was the youngest competitor, and he finished first in his category.

In Grade 9, he won the National Championship, the first person to win two years in a row, and in Grade 10, he placed first in the Western Canada National Debating Seminars.

He also represented Manitoba in the National High School Debating Seminars in Halifax in April 1997, where he qualified for the World Debating Seminars scheduled for Jerusalem in January 1997.

In October 1997 he finished first in the International Independent Schools Public Speaking Championships in Montreal and returned to Montreal in November for the McGill High School Debating Tournament, the largest event of its kind in North America. Once again, he finished first.

In Jerusalem at the World Schools' Debating Championship, he and his Canadian teammates were not quite as successful.

The team was undefeated in the regular rounds but lost a quarterfinal to Scotland to finish fifth. Kives finished fourth in a contest to determine the funniest debater.

He capped the year by winning the World Public Speaking Championship in Buenos Aires in March. The thesis: Be it resolved that it is better to die on your feet than live on your knees.

Next year's Worlds are in Botswana in southern Africa and Kives says you can bet that he'll be there.

After graduation, Kives is considering a career in criminal law or politics.

Hershon proud of accomplishments as CJC chief

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — It began on Mother's Day in 1995 with a plenary election that degenerated into electoral chaos and a razor-thin victory over challenger Thomas Hecht.

It went on to include a pivotal, also razor-thin referendum on separation and the first real progress on Nazi collaborators in Canada. It ended with the chance of losing the headquarters building in Montreal.

It's not the tumultuous term Montrealer Goldie Hershon had in mind three years ago when, as a somewhat reluctant candidate, she chose to run for the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) presidency.

Three years later and just a couple of weeks before handing over the title to Torontonian Moshe Ronen, however, she is glad she did.

Not that there's no relief in Hershon's mind that she'll finally have more time to devote to her family – husband Sheldon, children David and Cindy, and five, going-on-six grandchildren.

But CJC's second female president – the first was Dorothy Reitman, also a Montrealer – is proud to have carried the CJC banner across Canada and around the world, and of the accomplishments achieved during her tenure.

Goldie Hershon

"I mean, I did things I probably would never have done in my life," the outgoing president said in an interview with The CJN at her Hampstead home.

"Of course, there was the downside, the aggravation, the stress. But I had a terrific staff that was loyal and very, very good to me."

The national public advocacy issues that dominated the Canadian Jewish agenda, Hershon noted, were there when she came on board and will stay there after she leaves following the CJC plenary this weekend in Winnipeg: national unity, fighting anti-Semitism, hate mongering and literature, hate on the Internet, Nazi war criminals and small communities, among others.

But Hershon still feels she was able to make a personal mark, in part because of her people skills.

Take small communities, for example.

Hershon made it a point to travel to every province (except Prince Edward Island) in Canada, including Yellowknife, getting to know the smaller communities as part of CJC's mandate to help Jews everywhere keep their Jewish communities viable.

As part of her travels, Hershon went to Kelowna, B.C., where the Jewish community felt it was being neglected. She left with a sense that the community felt more reassured.

"That's the difference," she said. "When you go talk to people, it's much different than writing them a letter. So every time I took a trip, I made it a point to add a small community.'

Hershon said talks have been going on with Federation UIA (the merged body of CJF Canada and UIA Canada) over who will preside over the smaller communities agenda.

"It is Congress that should have the ultimate responsibility," she said, "because we have established the connections.

"It is an issue of continuity. If you want to be a Jew anywhere in Canada, you have to work at it. They want to be Jews, and we have to keep them. No other organization looks after small communities."

Hershon said her people skills also allowed CJC to enhance relations with other national Jewish bodies, such as the Canada-Israel Committee and B'nai Brith.

Hershon's three years as president, she admitted, were more demanding than she thought they would be.

She went to Israel. She went to Egypt. She went to the United States, Greece, Norway. She met with heads of state and government, with ambassadors, with politicians. A nice part of the job, she conceded, but also one that revealed to her over and over again the extent to which Congress is perceived with great respect at an international level.

"If we got the same respect from Jewish leaders," Hershon said sardonically, "it would be terrific."

Not everything about her presidency was positive, however.

Hershon found that despite a strong female presence in the Congress hierarchy, the same couldn't be said about the lay leadership within other Jewish bodies.

"It's still not equal," she said. "At nine out of 10 meetings I attended, either I was the only woman there or there was one other. It's like the old boys' club."

Hershon also will always remember the fact that CJC's Quebec region, in her view, started to negotiate its relocation to FEDERATION CJA without notifying her, a Quebec-based president.

While she now supports the move, the lack of consultation, she said, "bothered me. It really did, and it still does."

Although Congress had already intended to enhance its presence in Ottawa, the effect of the relocation on the Montreal national headquarters building are still up in the air, Hershon said.

The hope is that the building will either be used by McGill and Concordia universities or become a museum and archives for the Jewish community, which would give it tax-exempt status. In either case, the desire is to keep the building for the Jewish community and to retain the national archives there, even if the national administrative office has to move.

'Choice is clear:' Peres

If we want to remain a Jewish state, we have to have a Palestinian state. It's as simple as that. The choice is very clear."

In fact, "the majority of Israelis support a Palestinian state," putting them at odds with their leader, who opposes it.

Asked whether the United States has crossed the line in its current pressure on Israel to withdraw from more of the West Bank than Jerusalem is willing, Peres said, "We asked the Americans to serve as a honest broker. We invited them to be a witness. What do we expect? [They are] an honest broker, [taking] a middle position. I don't think [the U.S. proposals are] an imposition. It's an attempt to build a bridge."

In its effort to break the current deadlock in the peace process, Washington is pressuring Jerusalem to cede a further 13 percent of the West Bank to Palestinian self-rule. Israel says it will give up no more than nine percent.

Netanyahu, said Peres, is no longer negotiating with the Palestinians, but with the Americans, adding he doesn't think the prime minister has shown courage in standing up to Washington.

Peres fears that given Netanyahu's hard line, "I don't see how [the two sides] can reach an agreement." If the next round of talks in Washington fail, "we shall be in a crisis" and in danger of permanently hurting relations with the U.S.

"Let's be honest with ourselves, because we owe it to our children," he told the Bonds leaders. "They say we cannot give more to Arafat because we don't trust him. If we don't trust him, why give him nine percent? Why not give him nothing? If you say nine percent [represents] security, and anything above nine percent is insecurity, then we'll never have an agreement.

"Clearly, with nine percent, you cannot have a permanent solution."

Peres believes that "sooner or later," Netanyahu will hand over the 13 percent. "They may find a face-saving device [like] nine percent now, and four percent later."

However, "I don't think the price of peace will go down. But the price of postponing [it] will go up. By slowing down the peace process, the forces that oppose peace are accelerating their actions — rearming themselves, introducing very dangerous arms to the Middle East."

Peres asked his audience whether they want millions of Palestinians to become Israeli citizens and make up half the Knesset's membership.

Israel "is not a Jewish state. It is a state of the Jews. It is a Jewish state as long as we are the majority. If we lose our majority, we shall stop being a Jewish state, or we will stop being a democratic state, because then the minority will have to rule. We cannot behave this way."

Dr. Laura comes to Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The woman who has recently captured the title of North America's No. 1 radio talk show host, syndicated on over 400 stations across the continent, made her only Canadian appearance at Ottawa's National Arts Centre.

Dr. Laura Schlessinger, known to her fans as simply Dr. Laura, was in Ottawa with her husband Lew Bishop and son Derek, as a fundraiser for Congregation Machzikei Hadas.

More than 150 people attended the pre-performance luncheon including David Sultan, Ambassador of Israel to Canada; Mayor Jim Watson; regional chair Bob Chiarelli; and representatives of the Ottawa Jewish community.

Steve Madely of radio station 580 CFRA, one of the event's sponsors, said "we are proud that there are thousands of people in Ottawa who have been enriched by your presence on our station, and we are extremely proud that you have chosen to make Ottawa your only Canadian stop on this tour."

The impetus for Schlessinger's one-stop appearance was her friendship with Rabbi Reuven Bulka who has a show, Religion on the Air, on the same radio station.

Dr. Laura Schlessinger

Dr. Laura does with great success."

After the luncheon, Schlessinger spoke to a capacity crowd at the Opera of the National Arts Centre.

She said, "I was patrilineally Jewish which, as you know, is nice, but not enough." Her father, a "nice Jewish boy from Brooklyn" had met her mother, a Catholic Italian, during World War II.

They married, much to the displeasure of her paternal relatives in Brooklyn.

Always feeling like "there was a hole in my heart and I didn't know what to fill it with," Schlessinger said she converted to Judaism several years ago.

Although she, Lew and Derek had all had Conservative conversions, Schlessinger said they had recently had an Orthodox conversion.

She said that Judaism has brought meaning into her life and that becoming a mother was her "introduction to living for something outside of myself."

Fans of Dr. Laura recognized her trademark advice, telling people to work on their personal relationships, to be a parent before everything, to do the "right" thing rather than just the "fun" thing.

"There is a difference between having fun and being happy," she said.

Describing her commitment to keeping the laws of kashrut, she said "It makes me happy to know that I am the master, not the slave to food cravings."

'Do the right thing'

Ambassador Sultan told the audience "It has been said that people sometimes do the right thing, but only after exhausting all other possibilities. The clever thing to do is to help people do the right thing before exhausting all other possibilities. This is what

Victoria celebrates Israel's 50th

By SUZANNE KORT
Pacific Correspondent

VICTORIA — The celebration of Israel's 50th here was a tribute to community solidarity as much as a national birthday party.

At least 18 local groups helped organize the event under the auspices of the Jewish Federation of Victoria and Vancouver Island.

Miriam Fisher, president of the Jewish Community Centre of Victoria, and Leah Levi, Congregation Emanu-El Hebrew School principal, coordinated the evening. Participating groups included the Jewish National Fund, Women's League of Conservative Judaism, Society for Humanistic Judaism, and Habonim Dror Youth.

Several organizations, including United Israel Appeal, Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, and the Organization for Rehabilitation through Training (ORT), displayed their latest information at the University of Victoria's (UVic) Student Union Building.

ORT, an international network of vocational schools founded, funded and led by Jewish individuals, shared material about their newest school in Sarajevo, which is training people to help rebuild wartorn Bosnia. "Ours is a constantly evolving organization," explained local representative, Orli Kalfon.

UVic's Pardess Jewish Student's Society arranged the party. Members of Aish HaTorah helped children braid tzitzit (prayer shawl fringes) while the Reform Congregation of Victoria guided young gardeners through the planting of sunflower seeds.

Israel's Arab minority had a symbolic presence outdoors, where teenage members of United Synagogue Youth and Kadima set up a Bedouin tent complete with Arabic music, pillows and halavah.

Organizers scrambled for extra plates and food as hundreds of celebrants waited in line for their Mideast dinner of falafel, tabouleh and babaganoush.

Rabbi Victor Reinstein blew the shofar. Hebrew school students explored the birth of modern Zionism with a short dramatization of the historic Dreyfus affair.

Both children and adults presented Israeli songs throughout the evening.

The 18-member adult Jewish Community Choir included several participants with no previous knowledge of Hebrew songs or language. The performance was the choir's premiere.

Israeli folk and belly dancers, and the lively Victoria klezmer band, Mammaloshen, added their own musical flare to the event.

מוסיקה טובה כמעט בחינם-הורם פירוצקי

Brandeis returns to Jewish roots

By URIEL HEILMAN
The Jewish Advocate & JTA

WALTHAM, Mass. – As Brandeis University prepares to mark its 50th birthday, the Jewish-sponsored, non-sectarian university founded the same year as the State of Israel appears to be experiencing a resurgence of Jewish life unparalleled in the school's history.

While the number of Jewish students at Brandeis has remained relatively constant in recent years, students and faculty alike point to an increase in Jewish activity on campus, a growing number of Jewish institutes sponsored by the university and a renewed interest in Jewish affairs and community as indicators that Brandeis is returning to its Jewish roots.

It is not difficult for longtime members of the Brandeis community to pinpoint the beginning of this Jewish resurgence: the 1990 resignation of former university president Evelyn Handler.

During Handler's seven-year tenure, Brandeis reportedly lost considerable support in the Jewish community as a result of a drive toward diversification, which was viewed as coming at the expense of its Jewish character. When interim president Stuart Altman donned a yarmulke during Brandeis' first commencement ceremonies after Handler's departure, it was considered a harbinger of change on campus.

But, says Jonathan Sarna, a professor of American history at Brandeis, it was not until Jehudah Reinharz's assumption of the presidency in March 1994 that Brandeis took a crucial step back toward matters Jewish.

"President Reinharz has been able to articulate a vision for the university that makes its ties to the Jewish community central to what the university is about," Sarna said in a recent interview. "He glories in the university's Jewishness."

Born and raised in Israel, Reinharz is the first Brandeis alumnus to become president and his close ties with Jewish leaders and academics in the United States and Israel are regarded as a boon for the university. Fundraising has increased, university administrators report, and during Reinharz's tenure more than 12 Jewish-related centres and institutes have been created at Brandeis.

Reinharz is being credited for wooing back into the fold Jewish supporters who had been estranged from Brandeis and attracting the support of prominent Jews, including industrialists Charles Bronfman and Max Fisher and filmmaker Steven Spielberg.

"Brandeis is a microcosm of world Jewry and this imposes special obligations upon us," Reinharz said in an interview. "We are seen today by the Jewish community as the think-tank and action centre of the Jewish community."

In the past year alone, Brandeis has launched several programs to address Jewish issues.

While not everybody has been happy with Brandeis' turn back toward Jewish affairs, Reinharz remains unapologetic.

"I define very clearly what Brandeis is, knowing full well that some people will not like it," he said.

"Brandeis is unique. There is no other university that has service to the Jewish community as part of its mission."

The increased Orthodox presence at Brandeis, which began five years ago after students initiated a recruitment drive designed to appeal to day school and yeshivah graduates, has more than tripled in the last decade, according to Todd Kammerman, student president of Brandeis' Orthodox Organization.

Shabbat services have grown so large that seating space has become a problem, prompting Reinharz to acknowledge that the creation of a new Hillel building to accommodate this growth is "clearly one of the next things we need to do."

Student trips to Israel are 'life-changing'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

NEW YORK, N.Y. — Jodi Michaels tells students who are planning Israel trips to be prepared for a life-changing experience.

The 24-year-old native of Hamilton, Ont., who works in Hillel's New York office, speaks from her own experience. The job she has now – working on Israel-related Hillel programs in the greater New York area, and recruiting for Kefiada and Project Otzma – was the last thing on her mind when she left for Israel to participate in both leadership development programs in 1996.

An alumna of Stanford University, Michaels had studied human biology/pre-medicine and in her spare time led a women's discussion group called Haveret.

Her participation in Otzma last year was sponsored through the San Francisco and Hamilton Jewish federations. She is particularly grateful for the scholarship fund named in memory of her parents' friend Ralph Travis. "He was one of my favorite people, and he helped make it possible. He was an avid Israel supporter.

"I went and fell in love with the place," she told The CJN by phone from her Manhattan office. "I felt it would be rewarding to help the next round of youngsters get over to Israel doing the same programs."

Jodi Michaels

Michaels, who attended the Hamilton Hebrew Academy for 11 years, had never been to Israel and had no desire to go, but once she finished college, it seemed like a good idea to go and reconnect, she said.

"It was fascinating to go to Israel and relearn Hebrew, to be exposed to life [according to] a Jewish calendar. All the traditions I hadn't kept in a long time came back to me. It was an incredible experience."

Demonstrators killed attacking IDF positions

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — As many as 10 Gaza residents were killed and some 400 Palestinians wounded, eight seriously, as thousands of demonstrators, many of them throwing stones and firebombs, rampaged through IDF roadblocks around the Gaza Strip last week.

It was the most violent outburst since the September 1996 clashes between Israeli troops and Palestinian Police.

It was reported by the Palestinian Authority's (PA) Health Ministry director-general, Dr. Imad Tarawiya that 10 were killed, but estimates varied.

The demonstrators ignored appeals by the Palestinian Authority and attacked IDF soldiers in Gaza and in the West Bank, in a violent commemoration of the 50th anniversary of al-Nakba (the catastrophe), the Palestinian term for the founding of the State of Israel.

PA Information Minister Yasser Abed Rabbo blamed the "massacre" on the Israeli government, saying troops shot wildly at peaceful Palestinian demonstrators.

But Palestinian and Israeli eyewitnesses asserted that the clashes began when Palestinians left the planned route of the march and attacked IDF positions.

OC Judea and Samaria Brig.-Gen. Yitzhak Eitan stressed that no live ammunition was fired by security forces in the West Bank.

In Gaza, troops fired live ammunition only when their lives were in danger, the IDF spokesperson stressed. Otherwise they used rubber and plastic bullets and tear gas to disperse the rioters.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai met with Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, General Security Service head Ami Ayalon, and IDF commanders to assess the situation. He called on IDF officers to maintain contact with Palestinian security and intelligence officials, and deploy more troops where necessary, stressing that the policy is to restore calm to the area.

IDF sources said the clashes became so violent that Mordechai issued a personal appeal to Mahmoud Abbas, regarded as PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's chief aide, to use PA forces to stop the fighting.

Israeli military sources said the Palestinian Police had restored order by nightfall in most of the territories and termed their effort as genuine.

"Had we not acted with intelligence and patience, there would have been a lot more than eight dead," OC Southern Command Maj.-Gen. Yom Tov Samia said.

Reacting to the clashes, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu pinned the blame on the PA for stirring up hostility to Israel.

"It's easy to whip up a frenzy of bloodshed and violence," he said.

Speaking at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, Netanyahu said the Palestinians "must understand that agreements cannot be hostages to violence. It puts the Palestinian cause behind."

Despite PA assurances that the planned "march of the million" would be peaceful, the IDF had beefed up forces throughout the territories in anticipation of attacks.

Palestinian sources said soon after the march began at 10 a.m., young demonstrators began to stream to the IDF checkpoints throughout the Gaza Strip.

Hundreds began to throw stones and firebombs and tried to climb the fences surrounding Jewish settlements. Troops responded with rubber and plastic bullets and tear gas.

Palestinian policemen were overwhelmed by, in some cases, thousands of demonstrators, who swept past them toward the troops. At one point, a Palestinian grabbed a policeman's automatic weapon and began firing at an IDF position.

The most severe rioting was at the Erez roadblock where Palestinians mobbed a police position and headed for the IDF checkpoint less than a kilometre away. The troops lobbed tear gas, but soon resorted to live fire to disperse the crowd.

Palestinian sources said at least three people were killed and about 75 wounded in that clash. Palestinians were also killed in clashes with troops outside Gush Katif and at the Morag junction.

In the West Bank, Palestinians attacked numerous IDF positions. Heavy fighting was reported in Hebron, where 96 Palestinians were wounded by IDF gunfire. Eyewitnesses said hundreds threw stones and other objects at soldiers, who responded with plastic bullets, tear gas, and later, live ammunition.

In Bethlehem, 25 Palestinians were reported wounded near Rachel's Tomb, when hundreds of marchers left their route and attacked an IDF position. Soldiers responded with tear gas and rubber bullets.

OC Gaza Brig.-Gen. Yoav Gallant said in some areas the Palestinian Police successfully prevented the crowds from reaching IDF troops, in other areas they were unsuccessful, and in some cases they did nothing at all.

He charged that while the Palestinian police were responsible for restraining the rioters, it was clear that certain organizations worked behind the scenes to orchestrate last week's events.

"Those responsible for urging people into such a situation must have realized that someone would have to pay the price," he said, adding that IDF troops behaved in a restrained manner.

He disputed Palestinian charges that the large number of casualties were caused by the widespread use of live ammunition.

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Beit El, Ofra and other settlements "are here to stay forever," Labor party chair Ehud Barak declared last week.

He was speaking at the Beit El home of Yoel Tsur, whose wife and son were murdered in a drive-by shooting near the settlement in December 1996. He visited Tsur as part of a tour of five settlements in Judea and Samaria.

"From here, in Beit El, I want to send out a message to the people of Beit El and to all the citizens of the State of Israel: The Labor party and I have clear red lines. We will remain in Beit El forever."

However, he quickly added that "just as Israelis will remain here in Beit El forever, so will the Arabs remain in Ramallah.

"To achieve personal security – and no one realizes better than Yoel what a horrendous price the lack of such security can exact – we need to separate the two populations. We need a physical separation from the Palestinians."

Barak said that Labor has a "set of red lines which it will under no circumstances cross... A united Jerusalem must remain under full and unequivocal Israeli sovereignty; most of the population of the settlements will remain under Israeli rule in large settlement blocs; under no circumstances will we return to the 1967 lines; and there will be no foreign army west of the Jordan River."

Barak had warm words for the settlers and the settlements.

"I came here to see how the settlements have developed. It is heartening to see that there is so much growth and progress. There are beautiful projects here – the beauty is not only in the projects but is connected to the soul, to the soul of Israeli society."

Some residents suggested in jest that they would begin looking for a home for Barak in Beit El. They noted that neither Yitzhak Rabin or Shimon Peres had made comments like Barak's when they were prime minister.

But not everyone was pleased with Barak's remarks.

Political observers maintained that after Barak submitted a bill last Monday calling for the draft of haredi yeshivah students, he wanted to prove that he is not a radical left-winger.

Infrastructure plan approved by cabinet

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The cabinet last week approved the Treasury's NIS 1 billion economic growth proposals, after more than six hours of stormy debate.

Twelve voted in favor of the plan, with Natan Sharansky, Yuli Edelstein, Eli Suissa and Avigdor Kahalani voting against and Eli Yishai abstaining.

Another meeting is planned to discuss setting unemployment-reduction targets, Edelstein's spokesperson said after the meeting.

Under pressure from as many as half the ministers present, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu insisted the Treasury spend five percent of the money on people – presumably for retraining – rather than spending all of the appropriation on infrastructure.

The bulk of the funds will go into road and rail improvements, with NIS 10 million going towards preparations for the influx of tourists expected in 2000.

The theme of the plan is improving infrastructure to increase economic growth and thus reduce unemployment, now standing at 8.3 percent.

The measures approved also included non-budgetary items: Legislation for separating water and sewerage activities from the municipalities will be speeded up; the government will remove the bureaucratic blocks preventing a NIS 3b.-plus expansion of the Haifa and Ashdod ports; and rules concerning the employment of foreign workers will be tightened.

Russia-Iran ties irk U.S.

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — The United States and Russia are heading for a showdown over reports that Moscow is about to sell nuclear weapons technology.

Concern about the technology transfer, which would violate a 1995 U.S.-Russia agreement, were heightened by a visit to Moscow last week by an Iranian delegation to discuss "nuclear cooperation."

Diplomatic sources quoted by the Sunday Times in London said President Bill Clinton would raise the issue with Russian President Boris Yeltsin when they meet during the Group of 8 conference of industrialized nations, which was slated to begin Tuesday in Birmingham, England.

Russia has conceded that it sold nuclear technology to Iran, but only for civilian use.

The Iranian delegation to Russia, which was led by the head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, met with officials at Russia's Atomic Energy Ministry and at a nuclear research centre in Moscow.

A former aide to Yeltsin, Aleksei Yablokov, said he found it "a little bizarre that a country with the oil resources of Iran should be interested in developing atomic energy. It's pretty obvious that the end aim is to manufacture nuclear weapons."

In his 1995 agreement, Yeltsin told Clinton he would veto the sale of nuclear technology with dual-use capability, but there is widespread concern that he is about to renege on that agreement.

The anticipated Clinton-Yeltsin meeting follows talks between Clinton's national security adviser, Sandy Berger, and Russian officials over threats posed by Moscow's nuclear program and the proliferation of biological weapons.

An even more virulent strain of the lethal Ebola disease, which ravaged the Congo, reportedly has been developed in Russian laboratories, and Clinton is said to be alarmed at the prospect of such biological agents finding their way into the hands of terrorist groups.

Moscow synagogue damaged by bomb

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A Lubavitch synagogue in Moscow has been severely damaged by a bomb.

No one was injured in the nighttime attack, according to a spokesperson for Lubavitch World Headquarters in New York.

But the explosion occurred just minutes after some 70 children and their teachers had left the three-story synagogue building after celebrating the holiday of Lag b'Omer, the spokesperson said.

This was not the first attack on the Maryina Roscha synagogue, which is also a centre for Lubavitch outreach across the former Soviet Union.

Two months after the reconstructed synagogue was dedicated in July 1996, a bomb blast seriously damaged the building. No one was injured in that attack.

"While miraculously no one was seriously hurt, we cannot continue to rely on miracles," said Rabbi Berel Lazar, of the synagogue.

Rabbi Lazar called on "municipal and national authorities to find and prosecute those responsible for this clearly anti-Semitic act, in order to reassure the Jews of Moscow and Russia that they are still safe."

No suspects have been apprehended in connection with any of the attacks on the synagogue.

When Israel's legal system came of age

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel correspondent

Early on Friday morning, June 1, 1962, an Israel Navy patrol boat left port in Ashdod and headed out to sea. After reaching the limit of Israel's territorial waters, it continued on its westerly course and shortly afterwards, without ceremony, scattered ashes into the sea.

Commentary

The ashes were the remains of Adolf Eichmann. Eichmann, one of the main architects of the Nazis' final solution had been hanged just before midnight the previous day for his crimes against the Jewish people. His body had been cremated and his ashes were scattered in international waters so that his mortal remains could never be a source of focus for any fascist group or individual.

On Sept. 22, 1993, an El Al jet took off from Ben-Gurion Airport for a non-stop flight to New York. On board was John Demjanjuk, who was being deported after being released from the same jail where Eichmann had been held some 31 years earlier.

Demjanjuk's deportation followed the conclusion of his successful appeal to Israel's Supreme Court. The appeal judges overturned an earlier conviction and sentence of death passed on Demjanjuk, who had been accused of operating the gas chambers at the Treblinka death camp in Poland and causing the death of some 900,000 Jews. Demjanjuk was acquitted on the grounds of reasonable doubt.

The past half-century has seen many significant events that have molded the character and direction of the Jewish state. However, the scope of the Eichmann and Demjanjuk trials for crimes against the Jewish people in World War II could claim to be among the most significant events in the short history of the State of Israel. The horrors of the "final solution" were, in their own way, part of the raison d'être for the foundation of the Jewish state.

During Israel's 50th anniversary year, it is fitting that we reflect somewhat on the Eichmann and Demjanjuk "episodes" in Israel's history.

The incredible capture of Eichmann in South America and his journey to Israel to stand trial astounded the world. Here was a man who was being judged by the remnants of the very people he had hoped to annihilate. Ever since the foundation of the state, the Mossad had searched for Eichmann, following many leads that usually ended in failure. At one time, it was even erroneously thought that he was living in Kuwait. Eventually Eichmann was traced by the Mossad to Argentina, where he had been living with his family in Buenos Aires, under the assumed name of Ricardo Klement.

Once the Eichmann's identity had been verified, he was abducted by the Mossad on his way home from work in May 1960 and held secretly for 10 days in a quiet suburb of Buenos Aires, before being flown to Israel with his captors on an El Al jet.

Eichmann's trial began on April 11, 1961. For the next eight months, the nation and the world heard the survivors of the Holocaust retell their experiences. The witnesses told of death, torture, starvation, suffering and degradation.

The Eichmann trial could be regarded as a catalyst that brought to the attention of the world, in the controlled environment of a courtroom, a firsthand account of the conception and implementation of the attempt to remove the Jewish people from the face of the earth.

The trial itself was a document, an indelible record of the events of some 20 years earlier.

The court in Jerusalem represented the six million victims who were never able to confront their tormentors and bring them to the bar of justice.

The execution of Eichmann was carried out just hours after the rejection of his appeal to the Supreme Court. It was as if the Jewish people, through the judicial process, wanted to be finished with him. His presence, dead or alive, on Israel's holy soil was unacceptable.

The execution, cremation and disposal of Eichmann's mortal remains was not the end. It was a beginning.

In 1987, the attention of the world was once again focused on a courtroom in Jerusalem. This time, the accused was Demjanjuk, not an architect of the Holocaust, but rather one of its alleged executioners.

But 26 years had elapsed since the revelations of Eichmann. The people now giving testimony were that much older; their memories sometimes played tricks on them.

The trial of Ivan the Terrible, as John Demjanjuk was known in the Treblinka death camp, lasted for almost three years. Witnesses came forward to claim that the man in the dock was indeed Ivan the Terrible. The evidence seemed damning. There was no doubt that John Demjanjuk had been a concentration camp guard during World War II.

Demjanjuk was found guilty and sentenced to die by hanging. Once again, the courtroom had provided a record of the horrors of the Holocaust for future generations. There was general satisfaction that justice had been done and that the judicial execution would in some small way go towards satisfying the desire of many Jews to see a tormentor punished.

Demjanjuk's defence council, Yoram Sheftel, saw the case as a vehicle for a national desire to seek retribution against Demjanjuk. Sheftel was convinced that his client was not guilty as charged. He was, Sheftel claimed, a small cog in the Nazi extermination machine. Convinced of his client's innocence, Sheftel tracked down wartime documents in KGB files in Russia that proved Demjanjuk could not have been Ivan the Terrible.

After a protracted appeal process, the Supreme Court decided to quash Demjanjuk's sentence on the grounds of reasonable doubt. The victory was one for both Sheftel and the Israeli justice system, which, if anyone had doubted it, had come of age.

The address to the Washington Institute was studded with skillfully-composed metaphors and frequent rhetorical flourishes, all meant to convince his audience that security is the foremost consideration in working out a viable peace agreement.

He contended that the peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan "are based on [the realization on the Arab side] that there is no credible war option."

Arguing that there is "a vital link between peace and security," Netanyahu said "a peace that is not secure will not endure."

He rejected the notion that normal relations with the neighboring states could be construed as compensation for risks that might be taken for the sake of an agreement.

"A cold peace is infinitely preferable to a hot war," he said. "Normalization is a bonus, but it is not the foundation of peace."

He expressed his government's willingness to abide by the Oslo accords, but argued that "Oslo was meant to advance the peace without hurting security. We gave the Palestinians land [in return for their commitment] to fight terrorism. It failed."

His concept of an anti-terrorism campaign included "public education" against hostility to Israel and the annulment of the Palestine Liberation Organization's Covenant.

A roadmap of Canadian Jewish literature

This third and final article in a series presents a capsule summary of the Canadian Jewish literary scene.

By BILL GLADSTONE

This list, which highlights a wealth of talent and literature, is meant to be neither critical nor comprehensive. If it entices one reader to read one book, it will have served its purpose.

Pioneers

• Hyman Edelstein of Montreal published poetry on Jewish themes in the 1920s and 1930s, making him "the first established serious Canadian Jewish writer."

• Earth and High Heaven (1944), by Gwethalyn Graham. This novel, set in Montreal, presents an early treatment of the Jew in Canada by a non-Jewish writer.

• The Rich Man (1948) by Henry Kreisel. Story of a Canadian Jewish immigrant who visits his family in Europe in the late 1930s.

• The Second Scroll (1951) by A. M. Klein. A Montreal journalist travels to Morocco and the new state of Israel in search of his uncle in this complex novel that resonates with the epic drama of Jewish history.

• Son of A Smaller Hero (1955) by Mordecai Richler. Reflects the struggles of the post-immigrant generation to assimilate and captures the flavor of life in Montreal's Jewish ghetto with "an earnest realism unsurpassed in his later fiction."

• The Sacrifice (1956) by Adele Wiseman. Three-generational immigrant saga with biblical overtones; focuses on early Jewish life in Winnipeg.

Montreal

• Leonard Cohen (The Favorite Game, Beautiful Losers, Flowers for Hitler) – This post-modern poet-novelist-troubador mixes eroticism, drugs, the Zohar and Zen Buddhism into a poetic stew of angst, male-female relations and intensely spiritual-mystical lyrics often imbued with Jewish themes.

• A.M. Klein (Hath Not A Jew..., The Hitleriad, The Rocking Chair and Other Poems, The Second Scroll) – Immensely important poet (1909-1972), talmudically schooled, embraced Canadian and Jewish themes; won much acclaim and a significant multicultural following.

• Irving Layton (The Darkening Fire, The Unwavering Eye, A Wild Peculiar Joy) – A major poet, thematically more daring than Klein, characteristically brash and forthright.

• Mordecai Richler (The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, St. Urbain's Horseman, Barney's Version) – In his 10 novels, our most accomplished novelist has chronicled Montreal Jewish life from the 1940s to the present with verve, ironic humor, and increasing cynicism and schtick. His characters are strong, his plots cinematographic.

• Robyn Sarah (Promise of Shelter) – writes short stories and verse that sometimes contain Jewish themes and characters. Part of the promising new wave.

• David Solway – Like Cohen and Layton, the poet has a predilection for writing about Greece, but his complex, erudite style owes more to Klein.

Toronto

• Matt Cohen (The Spanish Doctor, Last Seen) – Prolific Kingston-born novelist who often utilizes Jewish themes. Often considered a "Jewish writer" in Europe; hardly ever considered so at home.

• Howard Engel – His entertaining detective novels feature Benny Cooperman, a Jewish sleuth in the fictitious town of Grantham, modeled after St. Catharines.

• Cary Fagan (The Animals' Waltz, Sleeping Weather) — Utilizes both Canadian and European settings and sensibilities. The Doctor's House, an acclaimed experimental "micro-novel," is set in pre-war and wartime Warsaw. An immaculate stylist and an important and promising voice for tomorrow.

• Phyllis Gotlieb (Ordinary, Moving) – Mainly a poet of experimental and children's verses, including some verses on chassidic themes; has written successful science fiction.

• Anne Michaels (Fugitive Pieces) – Her immensely successful first novel, a post-Holocaust story, reflects a deeply poetic sensibility as it stretches between the double settings of Europe and Canada.

• Janis Rapoport (After Paradise) – Poet-playwright whose highly metaphoric, surrealistic works touch on Canadian and sometimes Jewish themes.

• Ken Sherman (Clusters) – This prolific, highly lyrical poet combines Jewish and universal themes; accessible and intelligent. His recent Void and Voice is a collection of critical essays on Holocaust fiction.

• Morley Torgov (A Good Place To Come From, The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick) – His novels offer a humorous, lighthearted depiction of the foibles and dilemmas of small-town Jewish life.

• Helen Weinzweig – Novelist and short-story writer. Her Basic Black with Pearls is "a small masterpiece, expressionistic and Kafkaesque, that owes something to the work of Joseph Conrad and the genre of the mystery novel."

Ottawa

• Norman Levine (Canada Made Me, Thin Ice, Champagne Barn) — This short story writer, who lived in England for many years, has been described as "Canada's Chekhov." His voice is laconic, his themes borne out of life's suffering.

• Seymour Mayne (Killing Time) — Important and influential poet-critic who writes in an older tradition and focuses on Jewish themes, the Bible and Israel.

Winnipeg

• Adele Wiseman (The Sacrifice, Crackpot) — A chronicler of Jewish life in Winnipeg's Jewish North End, she is one of the most important voices in Canadian Jewish fiction. Her novel Crackpot centres around the extraordinary Hoda, a Jewish prostitute who overcomes a painful past, regaining self-integrity like a cracked pot that is mended.

• Jack Ludwig (Above Ground) — Now a U.S. resident, he has produced several novels, short-story collections and sports books.

Western Canada

• Henry Kreisel (The Rich Man, The Almost Meeting and Other Stories) – Born in Austria, he is probably the first to write in English about Jewish immigrant life in Canada. The Almost Meeting is based on his unsuccessful attempts to meet his contemporary, A.M. Klein.

• Eli Mandel (Life Sentence, Another Time) – An accomplished poet-critic who writes in experimental verse that deals with his Jewish past on the Prairies. A unique, geographically isolated voice.

• Norman Ravvin (Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish) – This eccentric, imaginative and darkly funny collection of stories (1997) places its author (currently based in Fredericton) squarely between Poe and Kafka. His novel Cafe des Westens describes Jewish life in Calgary. Part of the promising new wave.

Other voices

• Ottawa: Sharon Drache, Gabriella Goliger.

•Winnipeg: Carol Matas, Allan Levine, Rhea Tregebov.

• Western Canada: Sharon Klein.

French Canada

Three acclaimed writers are available in translation.

• Monique Bosco (Lot's Wife) writes prose and poetry, often on themes of exile and feminism;

• Regine Robin's latest translated novel The Wanderer (1997) has been named winner of the 1998 Martin and Beatrice Fisher Jewish Book Award for Fiction (ceremony in June).

Yiddish

Five esteemed writers who helped make Montreal a centre for Yiddish literature: Yehuda Elberg, Rochl Korn, Melech Ravitch, Chava Rosenfarb, J.I. Segal.

In Toronto, there's Simcha Simchovitch.

Criticism

• Michael Greenstein, Third Solitudes: Tradition and Discontinuity in Jewish-Canadian Literature (1989) – An erudite, fairly comprehensive study.

• Norman Ravvin, The House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory (1998) – Winner of the prize for literary criticism in the 1998 Jewish Book Awards.

* * *

Thanks to Cary Fagan, Adam Fuerstenberg, Michael Greenstein, Shel Krakofsky, Malcolm Lester, Ruby Newman, Zailig Pollock, Norman Ravvin, Ken Sherman, Libby Scheier and Ellen Seligman for their significant contributions to this list. Any errors and omissions are the compiler's alone.

Why a roadmap?

By BILL GLADSTONE

Landscape plays an important role in Canadian fiction, so what better way to negotiate a landscape than with a roadmap?

While non-Jewish writers often describe the Canadian landscape as vast, Jewish writers, especially those describing the "ghettos" of Montreal and Winnipeg, sometimes convey a sense of cramped space and confinement, according to Michael Greenstein, a Toronto professor of literature.

Canadian Jewish writers also often utilize the double settings of Canada and Europe or Israel, and retain a much grander sense of history, Greenstein asserts: "In general, if Canadian literature deals with 3,000 miles, Canadian Jewish literature deals with 3,000 years."

Montreal and Winnipeg have traditionally been important centres of Jewish literature in Canada, but since the 1970s, dominance has shifted to Toronto, a development that prompts Greenstein to express concern about where Canadian Jewish literature is headed. "The very nature of Toronto Jewish society today seems to me very thin, compared to what Richler and all the other Montreal writers were able to write about a generation ago," he says. "I just don't find the strength and the energy in Toronto that was present in the Montreal scene."

Others voice similar worries about the future of Jewish letters here. "With such a high level of assimilation I think authentic stuff in Canada and the United States is drying up," says writer-physician Shel Krakofsky, former editor of the Canadian Jewish literary journal Parchment. "I'm the pessimist here. I think the last gasp has been heard. You know where you may see the next wave of Jewish writing occurring in English? In Israel."

Still, Greenstein, Krakofsky and many others note with pride that Canada's Jewish minority has contributed much more than its proportionate share of literary riches and that a promising "new wave" of writers is emerging to carry the torch of the older generations into the future. And who can say how bright that torch will burn?

Patinkin goes Yiddish on CD

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the midst of selecting Yiddish songs for Mamaloshen, his newly released CD, Mandy Patinkin had a brainstorm.

Or, as the New York-based Emmy and Tony award-winning performer put it during a recent Toronto interview with The CJN, trying out some newly acquired, gutterally enunciated vocabulary, "Mittn derinnen, it hit me."

Despite the quantity of Yiddish CDs, tapes and old 78 rpm records he had to draw on, Patinkin felt something was missing.

He realized it was the music of American Jewish composers, many of whom were born in Europe, that would bring together his project's dual themes: the music's journey from eastern Europe, and the "journey of a family," encompassing birth, death, weddings and politics.

That's why the CD, which features a full orchestra, includes Yiddish versions of Take Me Out to the Ball Game, God Bless America, Supercalifragilisticexpialidocious and Paul Simon's American Tune. There's even a Yiddish rendition of Irving Berlin's White Christmas, which has a melody "as Jewish as anything," as Patinkin demonstrated with a brief cantorial warble.

Over a hasty late-afternoon meal of Middle Eastern take-out, Patinkin sat in a studio green room before appearing on Jane Hawtin Live!, discussing with The CJN some of his pet topics.

Last May, Patinkin had a corneal transplant in his right eye for keratoconus, a potentially blinding condition in which the cornea becomes cone-shaped, severely impairing vision. He anticipates having his left eye done as well.

He has become a public proponent of organ donation and urges people to make their wishes known to their next of kin.

"My sight was saved, but that's nothing like saving a life," he said.

Patinkin also has strong feelings about the Middle East peace process. He turned down an invitation to participate in Hollywood's televised Israel at 50 tribute because of his opposition to the current Israeli government's attitudes.

"There's nothing I would love to do more," said Patinkin, who has visited Israel twice, "but I cannot celebrate Israel until Israel has a government that wholeheartedly celebrates the peace process. I cannot appear at one of these celebrations, because it is not the place for rhetoric. There is no way to appear and not make it seem you're supporting their policy. It breaks my heart."

Proceeds donated

He has donated the proceeds from several of his concerts to Peace Now and is also a supporter of the Abraham Fund, which fosters Arab-Jewish co-existence in Israel.

Patinkin derives tremendous satisfaction from his Yiddish recording and concert work. The project stems from a promise he made eight years ago to Broadway producer Joe Papp, whom he considered a second father.

Papp, who had signed the ketubah at Patinkin's marriage to actress Kathryn Grody and carried their first son on a silver platter at his Pidyon HaBen, originally asked Patinkin to learn a Yiddish song for a YIVO benefit in New York.

At a Shabbat dinner at the Patinkin home shortly before Papp's death, he told the singer, "Mandy, you have to do this. This is your job."

Patinkin started working on the Yiddish album in earnest after giving up his regular role as Dr. Jeffrey Geiger on Chicago Hope to spend more time with his family. It became "the only real professional goal that ever really mattered...I felt it was my duty to do my share in passing on my heritage."

A native of Chicago with eastern European roots, Patinkin knew virtually no Yiddish, but found that singing it affected him deeply. "I loved how free it made me feel. It has filled my heart more than anything I've ever done. I don't know why this language unleashes my soul more than my native language."

Making the album was "the most complicated musical ride I've ever put myself on," said Patinkin.

He relied on a team of Yiddish experts, and the intangible presence of the six million who perished in the Holocaust, Papp, and Patinkin's late father, who used to sing him Yome, Yome, which is included in the album.

On a recent tour in Germany, Patinkin was surprised to see how enthusiastically his Yiddish music was received by his contemporaries, who viewed it as healing.

"My advice to everyone is, don't just eat the food and celebrate the holidays, but investigate your connection to who you are and what you come from – and particularly, learn the music of your culture."

1931 YIDDISH FILM ATTRACTS FULL HOUSE

The capacity crowd at the Bloor Street Cinema clearly enjoyed His Wife's Lover, a full-length 1931 Yiddish comedy screened last week as part of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Typically for that era, the plot was simple, the characters stereotypical, the cinematography unsophisticated. Yet His Wife's Lover conveyed a genuine screen magic, generated equally by the appealing romantic leads, Ludwig Satz and Lucy Levin, and by the comic innovations of S.R. Simkoff's script.

Satz, with matinee-idol good looks, plays a popular actor whom women adore. When his uncle, a wealthy and cynical factory owner, tries to convince him that all women are unfaithful in love, Satz leaps to their defence. The two make a big-stakes bet: Satz will impersonate an obnoxious old – and rich – man to test the loyalty of his potential girlfriend.

Hilariously, Satz is soon playing two corners of a romantic triangle. His impersonation of a feeble old man with a nagging, nasal voice seems very close to the nebbish that would later became Jerry Lewis' stock-in-trade. As his younger self, he occasionally evokes a Groucho Marx persona with tragicomic exclamations such as: "I'm going far away, to the place from which no one ever returns – New Jersey!"

Although Levin does indeed marry the old man for his money, she can't bring herself to consummate the relationship. Later she professes her love to the undisguised Satz, but is honor-bound not to pursue a relationship with him while she is married. Ultimately, the capitalist uncle is forced to pay up on the bet: women are indeed honorable in love after all.

It wasn't just the sound of spoken Yiddish that delighted moviegoers; it was also these early bits of Yiddish schtick. His Wife's Lover may be corny and slow by today's standards, but it demonstrates how deeply American cinematic comedy is indebted to the Yiddish stage.

His Wife's Lover was directed by Sidney M. Goldin. The organizers of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival are to be commended for bringing this and other subtitled Yiddish gems before the public each year. Eye on Arts appeals to any local video-rental establishment to make these films available all year round.

Artist explores truth in our lives

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A child of Holocaust survivors, artist Rhona Konrad, will present a thought-provoking exhibition of watercolors titled An Artist's Tribute to an Artist, May 24 from 2 to 5 p.m. at Upper Canada College, Upper School Common Room.

Konrad, who has a bachelor of arts degree with honors in art and history from McGill University, says that she has always been deeply influenced by the events of the Holocaust.

"The spirits of the family members I never knew call out to me and in my desire to know them, they appear in my art."

"Through my studies and explorations, I have discovered the world is one interconnected whole. Whether it is the destruction or creation of subatomic particles, the Temple in Jerusalem or [reciting] the Shema, everything is interrelated," she says. "My whole life I have tried to balance knowledge and imagination and I am constantly brought back to something Albert Einstein said, 'Imagination is more important than knowledge.'"

Konrad has developed, and employs an ethereal technique combined with an opaque use of watercolors to express her vision of the spiritual and mystical elements of our existence.

"This is juxtaposed to the strength and grounding aspects of architecture," says Konrad. Her use of symbols such as winding streets and spirits which appear within buildings and doorways "express my, and indeed our own journey of discovery."

She explains that movement through doorways and archways is her way of approaching and delving into the layers upon layers that mask the truth in our lives.

The power and stability of her buildings offset the ephemeral spirit world – a transitory realm between these two worlds where she says, "I find myself searching the mysteries of life."

Konrad, who was steeped in music and art at home, grew up in Montreal where her mother Uka taught piano. She began studying piano when she was three years old. At the age of eight, she won a full scholarship to the Conservatoire de Musique et D'Art Dramatique.

Her father Sigmund was a professional artist and owner of an art-gallery in Montreal. She learned to paint from him and regularly exhibited and sold her art work in his gallery. Konrad moved to Toronto in 1982.

For more information on the exhibit, call 665-0347.

STANLEY PARK: VANCOUVER'S HUGE URBAN PLAYGROUND

The largest urban park in Canada and the third largest in North America, Vancouver's Stanley Park is still "half savage and half domestic" as writer James Morris noted a century ago. The historic park offers visitors a compelling mix of untamed natural woodlands and well-pruned flower gardens, fierce aboriginal totem poles and a genteel Victorian-style seaside promenade. It also features family attractions like the Vancouver Aquarium and a children's petting zoo, as well as panoramic views of downtown Vancouver and the mountainous North Shore.

Roughly 1,000 acres in area, Stanley Park is larger than New York City's 800-acre Central Park. It is also larger than Montreal's 500-acre Mount Royal Park and Toronto's 400-acre High Park put together. For visitors prepared to abandon the beaten paths for rougher nature trails, Stanley Park offers some outstanding naturalist sites the likes of which can't be found in any of these other parks.

Situated on an elevated peninsula that juts into Burrard Inlet, the park receives some eight million visitors annually. Visitors may stroll, jog, cycle, skateboard or rollerblade along the 10-km-long Seawall that encircles the park and affords convenient access to its most popular attractions; bicycles may be rented just outside the park entrance.

The Stanley Park Scenic Drive, which circles the park, provides convenient access for motorists. Eager to reduce the number of cars on this one-way road, officials recently introduced a free shuttle-bus service.

The most popular attractions are situated close to the W. Georgia St. entrance. Foremost among these is the famous array of seven totem poles beside Brockton Point, some towering more than 13 metres, each representing a different British Columbian First Nation. Moved here from coastal villages, the totem poles serve as a reminder that aboriginals occupied the peninsula as recently as 150 years ago.

Brockton Point is said to be the most visited tourist spot in all of British Columbia's lower mainland. If so, the highly-rated Vancouver Aquarium – home to some 9,000 sea creatures including dolphins, octupuses, crocodiles and beluga and killer whales – must rank a close second.

The Vancouver Zoo was also located here until 1993, when a referendum called for its demise; after much downsizing, all that remains is one lone polar bear. In its place is the children's petting zoo, a farmyard compound of domesticated animals like ponies, goats, cows and sheep, representing unusual heritage breeds.

While much of the peninsula was logged in the mid-19th century, some of the biggest trees were spared the axe. Deep in the park interior are several stands estimated to be 800 to 1,000 years old. One tree, known as the National Geographic tree, is thought to be the biggest cedar in the world.

There are no signs to direct visitors to these huge monument trees. "We let people find them on their own," says a park official. However, a pocket map showing their locations is available from the information booth inside the park entrance. More accessible stretches of West Coast forest are located near Prospect Point, a promontory offering postcard-perfect vistas of the Lions Gate suspension bridge, downtown Vancouver, the North Shore and some islands in the Georgia Strait.

Other park attractions include Siwash Rock, a giant flowerpot rock formation at the water's edge, the Brockton Point lighthouse, the Lost Lagoon nature house and freshwater wildlife reserve, and several pools and sandy beaches that are open from Victoria Day to Labor Day. The Brockton Cricket Pitch, which consists of an old pavilion and cricket lawns, is where locals in quaint white suits indulge in England's peculiar version of baseball when the weather is warm and dry.

The quintessential spot for a picnic or barbecue, Stanley Park also boasts several restaurants. Near the rose garden, the Stanley Park Pavilion is a nice spot for a light lunch or high tea. Near the golf course, famous Vancouver chef Karen Barnaby presides over the Fishhouse Restaurant. Near Third Beach is the Ferguson Point Tea House, the park's most fancy restaurant.

Stanley Park is open year-round and admission is free. From downtown, it is accessible via a reasonably short cab ride or via bus #52. For tourist information on Vancouver or anywhere else in British Columbia, contact SuperNatural British Columbia, 800-663-6000.

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a simple premise that Jewish playwright Morris Panych of Vancouver brings to Lawrence and Holloman, at the Tarragon Theatre, but it works.

An overly optimistic Lawrence (Richard Zeppieri), who seems to have a rosy future ahead of him, develops a relationship with Holloman (Richard Waugh), a taciturn and nondescript individual who works in the same department store as Lawrence.

It's easy to fob off Panych's play as a comic two-hander because of Lawrence's malapropisms – he "emphasized" rather than "empathizes" with Holloman and he gets the "jest" but not the "gist" of a situation. But that would be a mistake.

There are layers of meaning within the snappy dialogue that illuminate the soulless, bitter feeling that some people have about the world. Panych uses humor (and why not?) to get his point across. It is well abetted by Ken MacDonald's stage design of the ground-floor marking of an old-fashioned elevator, symbolizing Lawrence's hope of going up, up, up in the world.

Of course, he doesn't go up, he goes down, loses his rich girl friend, is demoted to ready-to-wear, gets hit by a car, his apartment is burned down, he loses a leg to gangrene and ends up in a mental hospital.

At the same time, Holloman is drawn into the vortex, but suspicion arises that perhaps he is the author of Lawrence's misfortunes. Come to your own conclusions if you see the play, which runs until May 31.

Parenting an 'exhausting experience'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Parenting can be a stressful, demanding and physically exhausting experience, says the psychiatrist-in-chief at The Hospital for Sick Children.

"Most people aren't given credit for how exhausting it actually is," Dr. Susan Bradley told a meeting sponsored by Jewish Family & Child Service, York Region office; Wilshire Public School; and The Hospital for Sick Children.

Many factors, she told the group of young parents, make parenting difficult. "Many parents are caught between their own parents and their children. They are in the sandwich generation, and that can be very stressful.

"As mothers move into the workforce, the time they have with their children diminishes and that is also stressful. Most parents want to be available at all times, and they find the balancing between work and home very difficult."

The relationship that develops between a couple before they have children changes drastically when children come along, she said. "All plans change with children. The time people have to spend together shifts and the father often feels left out. If parents find the time to look after themselves, however, there will be less strain on the relationship."

She acknowledged that most parents attended the meeting because they wanted advice on dealing with their children's challenging temperments. "Problems arise because children are either strong-willed, shy and inhibited or hyperactive. All three groups pose a challenge that frustrates parents.

'When parents become frustrated... their tempers rise'

"When parents become frustrated, it is natural for their tempers to rise. What you get then is a spiraling effect where kids promote an intense reaction."

Once children start to use being oppositional as the main way of saying how they feel, said Bradley, parents must begin setting limits. "Kids want what they want, when they want it. When setting limits, it is important for parents to be consistent and firm."

She said that most children learn quickly that if they push enough their parents will back off. "Parents then become frustrated and that particular subject becomes a battleground."

Kids know when to push buttons and how long to keep up their behavior, she said. "Your reaction forms the pattern they relate to."

As soon as parents realize they have lost control, they begin yelling, said Bradley. "The secret is to find a strategy that allows the parent to gain control. It is important to find ways to manage yourself when you become frustrated."

Although there is "no magic in parenting," Bradley suggested that a reward system helps establish good behavior. "Reward kids on a regular basis for the behavior you want them to exhibit. Be very specific as to what you want the child to do. It is important, however, to set up a reward system in such a way that the child can win."

She said that if parents are stuck in a pattern that frustrates them, they need to do something different. "A different strategy helps parents out of the hole, and makes them feel less stressed."

Breast cancer clinic launched at NYGH

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The new Charlotte and Lewis Steinberg Familial Breast Cancer Clinic at North York General Hospital (NYGH) is the first of its kind in Ontario to be located at a community hospital.

The hospital recently announced a "generous annual donation" from the Steinberg family to fund the clinic, which was established to honor the couple's three daughters, Karen, of Montreal, and Heather and Lynn, of Toronto.

At the clinic, women will be able to determine if they carry the hereditary factors which occur in five to 10 percent of all breast cancers, said clinical geneticist Dr. Wendy Meschino, its medical director.

Women are referred to the clinic by their physician and will be seen for genetic consultation and counselling by a team consisting of a clinical geneticist, family physician and genetic counsellor.

"We've had wonderful treatment from doctors at the NYGH," said Steinberg, 67, a grandson of the founder of the Steinberg grocery chain in Montreal.

Through his company, Multi Restaurants, Steinberg, now retired, operated several restaurants in Toronto. He originally worked for the grocery chain in Montreal.

"We felt that we had to do something tangible to help women and their families deal with breast cancer," said Charlotte Steinberg. "Taking steps now, sooner rather than later, to know what your risk may be, can help so many women and families get on with their lives."

"My mother always said you should give something back to the community," said Lewis Steinberg.

Meschino said that women want to be tested because they hope to find out they have not inherited the gene. "For some people living at risk is worse than knowing that they will develop the disease," she said.

In recent years, two inherited breast cancer genes , BRCA1 and BRCA2, have been identified. In selected families, genetic testing for these genes is now possible.

According to Meschino, breast cancer might be hereditary when one or more of these risk factors is present: several family members are affected; diagnosis at a young age (less than 50 years); two or more primary tumors in the same individual; other related cancers (e.g. ovarian cancer); and male family members with breast cancer.

DNA testing for hereditary breast cancer genes will be conducted by the Molecular Genetics Laboratory at NYGH and the Ontario Cancer Genetics Network research laboratory.

Dear David & Esther,
I am writing this letter with appreciation and gratitude. The Appreciation is for the support and service that you have provided to me in not only the purchase of a new home but in the selling of my existing home. To enter the market and find your dream home and then to sell your own home at 99% of the asking price, is a skill and an art. The gratitude is for the perseverence, guidance and dedication that the two of you have demonstrated continually. You are both true professionals in your field.
— Sincerely, Sema Schreiber

Late start doesn't hamper squash champion

BY PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For someone who's won his fair share of gold, silver and bronze medals, Robbie Osher got a fairly late start at the great game of squash.

It wasn't until he was 31 that he first picked up a racket in his hometown of Johannesburg, South Africa but by age 34, he was making a name for himself in squash circles across the country, representing the province of Transvaal in national competitions.

Back in those heady days, he could be counted on to finish in the top 10 in "open" events, often competing against players 10 to 15 years his junior.

He's still taking on youngsters, although the age gap might be closer to 35 years these days. Truth be told, the 59-year-old Osher finds it hard to find a good game from those in his age group. He finds most men his age have gone "a little soft"– in their games that is, so he calls upon younger players to get a good match. You can see him at the Northridge Club, his home turf, teaching some young whippersnapper the finer points of the game that come with years of excellence and experience.

But those health club "friendlies" are only tune-up matches for the big games he plays during the season.

At the Canadian Open in Calgary recently, Osher was top Canadian, losing in the final to the U.S. champion. He's ranked as the top Canadian in the +55 category and he won the Ontario +55 title in 1997 and again in '98.

Before he moved to Canada permanently two years ago, Osher won many South African provincial and national titles in the +45, +50 and +55 age groups.

He was voted Provincial Veteran Squash Player of the Year in South Africa in 1994 and won all provincial matches from 1986 to 1994.

The son of Lithuanian immigrants, Osher represented South Africa at the Maccabiah Games in Israel on three occasions, winning individual bronze and team gold in 1985, silver in '89 and silver again in 1993.

"I'm a very unorthodox player. I play very unorthodox shots. I delay my shots. I've got a very strong wrist and can delay it right to the end," he says.

With his delay shots, Osher can get younger, more inexperienced opponents to commit themselves in anticipation of his next shot – and then put the ball where they ain't. In addition, Osher says, "I play a very lethal "boost," a sidewall shot that I can play from anywhere on the court. And I hit the ball fairly hard, compared to the older players."

An all-round athlete, Osher has been a runner, a tennis player, a golfer and he's enjoyed swimming and hiking as well. But even he has had to adapt to advancing years.

"Up to my early 30s, I was a runner and no shot could pass me. As I got older, I had to develop racquet skills," he says.

With the summer upon us, Osher, a management consultant, has cut back his matches to two a week. When he kicks it up to four times per week, you'll know summer is over and he's gearing up for another round of tournaments.

After all, he'll be turning 60 soon and that opens up a new category (+60) he hasn't won yet.

Henrich a likely first-round pick

TORONTO — The upcoming NHL draft has never been so interesting for those who follow Jewish athletes.

The reason is simple. For the first time in more than a dozen years, a Jewish junior has the chance to be selected early in the first round.

Toronto-born Michael Henrich, a power forward for the Barrie Colts, is rated by NHL Central Scouting as fifth overall among North American skaters. While that rating does not include goalies and Europeans, there's a good chance Henrich will be picked in the top 10.

The last time a Jewish player was considered so highly was in 1984 when Toronto native Brian Wilks was chosen by Los Angeles early in the second round. With the addition of more NHL teams, that selection would have made him a late first round pick if the draft were held today.

The Inside Back

Moshe's book tour

By JORDAN MAX

"Nu, Mr. Palmer?" Moshe Rabbeynu began, as he nervously adjusted his fedora. "I heard you were the best literary agent in town. So what do you think of the Torah?"

Stephen Palmer looked puzzled for a moment, then responded "Oh yeah, the scrolls that wouldn't fit in the file drawer... Moish, let me tell you, it's a great first draft, with lots of potential, but frankly, between you and me, I think it needs a major rewrite. You see, for a book to sell big time today, it needs some real sleaze, some laughs, political intrigue, pacing. And besides, the length..."

Last Laugh

Moshe was taken aback by Stephen's bluntness. "You think it's too long, but it's in its final form. It's the blueprint for a well-functioning society. I wrote it exactly as I heard it direct from God Himself. Besides, it's got all those things, just look at the first book, Breisheet. It's filled with creation and destruction, family intrigue, sibling rivalries, murder, wedding night mixups, swindling, weird dreams, you name it.

"And Shmot... with an evil pharoah, enslavement, Ten Plagues, liberation, splitting the Red Sea, the Revelation at Har Sinai, the building of the Mishkan. And Vayikra..."

"Vayikra" Stephen interrupted. "That's the third book, right?"

"Yes" Moshe replied, sounding somewhat annoyed.

"Don't take this the wrong way, Mo, but it's dry reading, all this stuff about societal laws, animal sacrifices and priestly duties. Aside from that Golden Calf scene, readers are just going to stop reading. So, Mo, if you really want to make this book sell, how about, say, taking out those laws on adultery, and rewriting those middle sections with a political scandal or two, some romance scenes, a chariot chase, maybe even a good all-out battle... Then, we'll need to secure the movie rights, get some backers, hire a good screenwriter, a sober director..."

Moshe looked perplexed, and asked naively. "Excuse me, Mr. Palmer, first of all, I can't do a "rewrite" as you call it, and second, unless I'm missing something, shouldn't people read the book first, before it's made into, what did you call it, a movie?"

"MR, where have you been? Nobody reads anymore, especially something this long. So here's the plan. First, we cast Len DC as the lead, and the Spice Girls as the female parts. Then we shoot the movie offshore, call it a foreign film to get it into Cannes and Sundance, win the critics' awards, line up the distribution, get a big studio to do a massive release, put it out on video three months later, promote the heck out of the book, spun as the book behind the critically acclaimed blockbuster movie, get it?

Just think of it, MR, the book signing tours, Larry King, Oprah's book club, the Oscars even. Of course, then there's the spinoff promo products, like kids' toys, the movie soundtrack, a music video, a Disney animated version, CD-ROM video games, a cartoon series, you name it. This could be bigger than Star Wars. Say... you got any characters in your book for cute stuffed dolls?... Wait, I see it now, a whole new line of Torah Babies. MR, if this takes off, we're talking serious cash and a six-figure sequel advance."

Moshe was turning red. "Well, actually, Mr. Palmer, you see, Shmot 20, verse 4 expressly forbids worshipping graven images, so the dolls are out." He angrily got up to leave. "Sorry, Mister Palmer. I've heard enough. No deal. The Torah is the Torah, no rewrites, no movie. I don't want any of this funny business. I'll do it mineself. Goodbye."

With that, Moshe stormed out of the office. "Meshugeneh people, these agents" he muttered as he calmed down and flipped open his cell phone. "Yehoshua, yeah it's me. Listen, things didn't work out with that agent you sent me to. It's time for Plan B. Book me a mountain, will you? Something nice, not too high, you know I get dizzy. And, while you're at it, some thunder and lightning..."

Netanyahu receives Torah from Toronto students

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Representing more than 4,000 Jewish students from the Greater Toronto Area, nine students presented a sefer Torah to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in his office here last week.

Elizabeth Moorehouse-Stein, John Spence, Avi Vander Sluis, Lorne Birnbaum, Shoshana Klein, Menashe Rosen, Aliza Jesin, Samuel Zieleniec and Aviva Dimant-Zieleniec, as well as representatives of the Zieleniec, Jelinik and Markowitz families were not really sure if the meeting with Netanyahu would take place at all.

Due to scheduling pressures, the prime minister had to cancel several prior engagements. However, he did not disappoint his Canadian visitors.

"It really is a distinct pleasure to be here today," project coordinator and Associated Hebrew Schools Junior High principal Jerry Rosenfield told Netanyahu. "We've arrived today from Toronto, Canada, following the initiative of the Mizrachi organization of Canada to commission the writing of the Torah in honor of Israel at 50; to be given to the Israel Defence Force in memory of all those who fell, as well as to the memory of Simcha Zieleniec and Alexander Jelinik.

"We have with us as well a significant number of the members of the Zieleniec, Jelinik and Markowitz families who sponsored the sefer Torah and made the project possible.

"The students and parents who are in Israel today are the lucky ones representing the thousands of students of the day schools and supplementary schools of Toronto who subscribed for the writing of letters in this sefer Torah and really enabled this project to come to fruition. Today we bring the sefer Torah to you, Mr. Prime Minister, and on Thursday [we bring it] to Zahal (Israel Defence Forces). We come united with you from around the world in love of Torat Yisrael and Medinat Yisrael."

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu holds the sefer Torah presented to him last week by nine Toronto-area students. The Torah was written through "subscriptions" to individual letters by over 4,000 Toronto Jewish day and supplementary school students. It was then handed to the Israel Defence Force to commemorate Israel's fallen soldiers. [Edgar Asher/Isranet photo]

Rosenfield agreed and continued, "The Torah is the bridge between the Yadut Hagolah [Diaspora communities] and Eretz Yisrael. Mr Prime Minister, we know that you face tremendous challenges as you shoulder the awesome responsibilities of leading our people as you seek true peace with security for Am Yisrael here and around the world . Be strong. It has to be right to be good; we are with you.

"The rabbis teach us that when HaShem wanted to bestow merit upon His people He gave them the Torah and the opportunity to be able to live by its teachings and tradition and therefore find favor in His eyes. With this sefer Torah that the youth of Toronto bring today to share with you and Zahal in celebration of Israel at 50, we pray that HaShem will give you the strength with which to achieve the peace."

"Thank you very much to you all," the Prime Minister responded. "I am delighted to receive this sefer Torah and pass it on to the soldiers of Israel. As you know, when fighting with weapons, the most important weapon is this – our faith and traditions and the justice of our cause; that is our real weapon. I thank you for strengthening it."

The Canadian delegation presented the sefer Torah to the IDF later in the week, when they visited a Jordan Valley army base.

Israelis celebrate Jerusalem Day

By ELLI WOHLGELERNTER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Energetic dancing, a military parade, nationalist songs, memorial ceremonies, a couple of scuffles and a huge traffic jam marked Sunday's 31st annual Jerusalem Day celebration.

The main event was the parade, which was more elaborate than in past years as it also was part of the 50th anniversary celebrations. It included 13,000 paratroopers, pilots and sailors, and many army vehicles, while F-15 fighter planes and C-130 transport planes flew overhead.

Tens of thousands of people lined the parade route along Jaffa Road and King George Street, waving flags and waving to their friends, as a festive holiday ambience prevailed throughout the downtown area.

In eastern Jerusalem, however, it was a different story. Outside the Old City walls, two dozen Arabs threw stones at police and the passing parade, wounding two marchers before police dispersed the stone-throwers. No one was arrested.

On the streets inside the walls, a few flag-waving celebrants got into a tussle with some Arabs, but no one was hurt.

Outside Orient House, the spokesperson for Our Jerusalem, Ronn Torrosian, got into a fight with one of the security guards when he placed a placard on the sidewalk in front of the gates of the building.

"Today, on Jerusalem Day, we see that the Arabs respond with violence to peaceful Jewish protesters," Torrosian said. "Even worse, however, is that the Israeli police refused to take action against those Arabs who resorted to violence."

For their part, the Arab population saw the day's activities – which actually began the previous night, with celebrations at the Beit Orot yeshivah on the Mount of Olives that continued until dawn Sunday – as a provocation.

Several Palestinian groups distributed a leaflet urging Moslems to gather at Al-Aksa to prevent the Temple Mount Faithful from praying on the Temple Mount. Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement and Moslem clerics signed the leaflet.

Police stopped about 40 members of the Temple Mount Faithful, which claimed it had police permission to enter the Temple Mount Sunday, from entering the area.

"We came to say that Jerusalem is a Jewish city forever," the group's leader Gershon Salomon said outside the Mugrabi Gate, the entrance to the Temple Mount from the Western Wall plaza. "Never will a

BEN-GURION AIRPORT — The first regular non-stop Air Canada flight from Montreal to Tel Aviv was given a festive welcome at Ben-Gurion Airport on May 20.

The flight, which was almost full, had about 145 fare-paying passengers; the remainder were guests of the airline.

As the 203-seat Boeing 767 taxied to a stop a few minutes after 5 p.m., two side windows in the cockpit were removed and a huge Israeli flag and an Air Canada flag were waved from each side of the aircraft by grinning aircrew.

The News in Brief

Canada

Reaction Regrettable

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Quebec region, finds regrettable the negative reactions which have arisen as a result of David Levine's recent appointment as director of the newly merged Ottawa Hospital.

"Freedom of opinion and of conscience are at the heart of our democratic life. It is truly regrettable that certain individuals have rejected these fundamental principles and are quick to condemn a respected administrator for presumably having the wrong political opinions," said Dorothy Zalcman Howard, CJC Quebec region chair.

Jeffrey Boro, CJC Quebec region community relations committee chair, said there is little doubt that Levine is highly qualified for the position.

Beutel Appeals

TORONTO — New Brunswick cartoonist and illustrator Josh Beutel is appealing a Court of Queen's Bench decision that found he libeled former Moncton school teacher Malcolm Ross.

Judge Paul Creaghan had ruled that Beutel libeled Ross through an illustration that depicted the former teacher as a Nazi. Creaghan accepted Beutel's contention that Ross was a racist and that he held anti-Semitic beliefs, but he also found that Ross strongly denied being a Nazi and that his views differed with Nazi views on Jews on several key points.

In his appeal documents, Beutel claims the judge erred in finding the illustration was false or defamed Ross. He also alleges that Creaghan was mistaken in dismissing Beutel's defence of fair comment. Beutel contends he needs not prove Ross was a Nazi before establishing the defence of fair comment.

He is also contesting the award of damages, which amounted to $7,500. The appeal is expected to be heard in late fall.

Israel

Performances Cancelled

JERUSALEM — A controversy erupted over whether female singers should perform at Israeli President Ezer Weizman's swearing-in ceremony. Weizman, who is beginning his second term, first suggested that female singers in an army choir not perform at the ceremony, in deference to religious Knesset members. But that idea drew strong objections from secular lawmakers, prompting Weizman to cancel all performances by artists at the ceremony.

Israel Pays For Drugs

JERUSALEM — The government has said it would begin paying for drug cocktails for patients infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS. The estimated annual cost of the therapy is $13,000 per patient.

No Charges Laid

JERUSALEM — A judge decided not to bring charges against soldiers who opened fire at a van carrying Palestinian workers from Israel to the West Bank earlier this year, killing three of them. The van had overtaken a line of cars waiting to go through a checkpoint near Hebron and veered toward the roadblock. The soldiers then opened fire, thinking the van's driver was trying to run them over. The incident, which provoked widespread Palestinian demonstrations, was later found to have been caused by the van's accidentally going out of control.

Group Accuses Shin Bet

JERUSALEM — Israel tortures 850 Palestinians per year, according to the human rights group B'Tselem. Most of the incidents, according to the group, came during interrogations of prisoners.

The group made the statement as the head of Shin Bet defended the shaking of prisoners as an essential part of the activities of Israel's domestic security service.

Ami Ayalon, who called the practice a vital method of stopping acts of terror, submitted a statement to the High Court of Justice before it holds a hearing later this week on whether to continue to allow the practice.

New Centre Being Built

JERUSALEM — The cornerstone was recently laid for the Samson Centre at the World Union for Progressive Judaism (WUPJ). The new structure will include a 400-seat, state-of-the-art theatre, a fully equipped conference centre and a hall for major events. It was designed by Israeli architect Moshe Safdie.

Partners involved in the new centre include WUPJ, The Jewish Agency for Israel, The United Jewish Appeal, UJA/Federation of New York and the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism.

Kotel Prayer: Peace Urged

JERUSALEM — Am Echad, an Orthodox group, has placed an advertisement in national newspapers asking worshippers to rethink their planned mixed-gender Shavuot prayer service at the Western Wall.

Last Shavuot, a small group, mostly from the United States, held a mixed-gender prayer service, described by one of the organizers as a rally for Jewish religious pluralism. Many people were offended by the rally and some reacted in an "ugly and indefensible manner," said Am Echad.

World

Congress Writes Albright

WASHINGTON — The United States should cease its support for the Palestinian Broadcasting Corporation, 62 members of Congress said in a letter to U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. The letter, which has been circulating the past month in Congress as part of a Republican-led effort, cites what it charges is the corporation's continued support of violence and terrorism against Israel. Since 1994, the corporation, which runs a television and radio station, has received about $500,000 from various U.S. federal agencies.

Sharansky Assured

MOSCOW — Russian officials assured visiting Israeli Trade Minister Natan Sharansky that a tank on display in Moscow did not contain the remains of three Israeli MiAs. Media reports originating from Moscow had suggested that the tank was from the 1982 Lebanon War and held the remains of Zechariah Baumel, Yehuda Katz and Zvi Feldman. According to Israel officials, the three were taken prisoner during the war and were subsequently declared missing.

Kissinger Made Citizen

FUERTH , Germany — Former U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, 74, received honorary citizenship from the German town that he and his family fled when the Nazis were in power. Germany's foreign minister, Klaus Kinkel, joined the town's mayor in honoring Kissinger's contributions as a diplomat.

CJC Plenary addresses wide range of issues

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — On May 24 and 25, delegates from across the country gathered here for the 25th Plenary Assembly of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

It was the first time the plenary was held in a location other than Toronto or Montreal.

Close to 500 delegates attended, including over 300 from the host city, despite earlier concerns that the turnout from the host city would be poor.

The plenary's first order of business was the annual general meeting (AGM).

Outgoing treasurer Zave Climan of Montreal reported that the last six years have been financially difficult for Congress, as the budget has shrunk from $3.7 million to just under $3 million.

"There has been tremendous pressure on our staff," Climan said. "We have had to eliminate some programs and severely curtail others."

Outgoing president Goldie Hershon noted that the CJC is involved in discussions with constituent federations to develop plans to change how the organization functions.

Jack Silverstone, the CJC's national executive director, observed that this year's AGM was the best attended of any he has participated in.

"In the past three years," he said, "we have tried to maintain stability during a time of change. We have had to do as much as usual with less as well as dealing with other issues that have cropped up, such as the controversy over the Holocaust gallery in Ottawa, in addition to looking after our normal mandate."

He identified hate and Holocaust denial on the Internet, restitution for Holocaust survivors and millennium-inspired Christian proselytizing

Maj.-Gen. Uzi Dayan, recently appointed deputy chief of staff of the Israel Defence Force (IDF) and nephew of the late Moshe Dayan, carries a Torah presented to the IDF by nine Toronto Jewish day and supplementary school students, and members of the sponsoring families. The event took place at the Rotem army base in the Jordan Valley. Over 4,000 Jewish students in Toronto and area participated in the writing of the Torah, which was presented to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu earlier. [Israel/Edgar Asher photo]

Elsewhere in this issue is an article by Edgar Asher, The CJN's Israel correspondent, on the three-day Canada-Israel Law Conference that recently concluded in Tel Aviv.

As Asher reported, it was the third such conference to be held in Israel since 1992. The significance of the conference, intriguingly called Litigating the Values of a Nation, and even more so, the significance of the Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Programme, one of the conference's co-sponsoring bodies, cannot be overstated.

Canadian jurists, a broad word that encompasses lawyers, judges and scholars well versed in the law, have met and are meeting with Israeli jurists. At the highest levels of the interdependent, contiguous fields of law in both Canada and Israel – namely, the bench, the bar and the academy – ideas are being exchanged, formal relationships are being formed or enhanced, and personal and institutional ties are being strengthened.

It is a virtual cross-pollination of two legal cultures and systems, with each gaining a measure of freshness and reinvigoration in the process.

The Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Programme is an inter-university consortium of Canadian and Israeli law schools. It began in 1992 and was, in part, the brainchild of Irwin Cotler of McGill University.

Cotler is no stranger to readers of The CJN. He is one of the world's foremost experts on international human rights, an intrepid, fiery activist against human rights violations, and an occasional essayist for this paper. In this space, two years ago, I wrote about his testimony to an investigative committee of the United States on the subject of the Palestinian Authority's treatment of its own citizens.

He explained that the founding of the program in 1992 was inspired by a statement of Justice Aharon Barak, now the chief justice of Israel's Supreme Court, to the effect that "Israel in 1992 is where Canada was in 1982; and Canada will be the single most important [constitutional] repository for Israel in the months and years ahead." (In 1992, as Asher has recorded in his article, Israel enacted a "mini-bill of rights" modelled on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.)

At the same time interestingly enough, Cotler notes, Chief Justice Antonio Lamer was speaking of the "revolutionary" impact of the Canadian Charter of Rights, and how it had emerged as a model for countries enacting rights charters.

This fortuitous confluence of judicial pronouncements was the springboard for Cotler's creative, driving imagination.

The Canada-Israel Legal Programme was organized from a number of universities that included the faculties of law at McGill University, the University of Toronto, the University of Alberta and the Faculty of Law and the Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. It has since been joined by Tel Aviv Law School and the Israeli Association of Canadian Studies.

The initial honorary co-chairs in 1992 were Lamer from Canada and Meir Shamgar, president of the Supreme Court of Israel.

The current honorary co-chairs of the program are Lamer and Aharon Barak, current president of the Supreme Court. Cotler and Justice Yitzchak Zamir of the Israeli Supreme Court are the de-facto co-chairs.

The directors of the program include the presidents and the deans of the faculties of law of the participating universities.

It is worthy of emphasis, therefore, that the people involved in this ongoing program are at the very centre of the heartbeat of legal developments in Canada and Israel.

The first two initiatives of the program were the conference in Jerusalem in 1992 entitled Chartering Human Rights, and a Supreme Court Judges Seminar involving supreme court and appellate court judges from both countries.

Cotler observed that the Canadian group at the conference in Israel in 1992 was "one of the most impressive Canadian legal rights delegations ever to visit another country." It included justices Claire L'Heureux-Dube, Beverley McLachlin and Charles Gonthier of the Supreme Court of Canada; Appellate Court justices Rosalie Abella and the late Walter Tarnopolsky from Ontario; Quebec Superior Court Judge Herbert Marx, the then-deans Yves-marie Morissette, Robert Sharpe, and Bruce Elman of McGill, Toronto and Alberta respectively; and such distinguished scholars as professors Kathleen Mahoney of Calgary, Lorraine Weinrib of Toronto and Danielle Pinard of Montreal.

This year's conference had even a larger roster of eminent participants.

One of the key reasons I bring the conference and the program to the attention of the reader is to show yet another way, with the participation of the Canadian legal establishment, in which Israel, merely 50 years after its founding, is strengthening its democratic institutions. In the process of participating, of course, both democracies are strengthened.

Refugees are dissidents, not criminals: Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The 10 refugees currently in Israeli jails whom Canada has been asked to take in are not criminals but "dissidents," says Israel's embassy in Ottawa.

And according to the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR), there is "no evidence at all" to suggest that the 10 refugees have criminal or terrorist links.

Israel's embassy says the 10 – six Iraqis, two Syrians and two Iranians, all men – are army deserters who entered Israel illegally.

"They are dissidents, not criminals," said embassy spokesperson David Cooper.

The men have been in jail since the early 1990s. They are political asylum seekers, and there's nothing to suggest they are terrorists or spies, a UNHCR spokesperson told The CJN last week.

A Toronto newspaper quoted an Israeli source as saying the defectors are "enemies of Israel."

But Israel never charged any of the men with a crime and detained them simply because they sneaked into the country, said Nanda Na Champassak, the UNHCR's spokesperson in Ottawa.

Champassak said Israel asked the UN to look into the detainees' plight. The UN agency conducted interviews and found them to fit the definition of refugee: someone with a well-founded fear of persecution should they be returned to their homeland, Champassak said.

Israel won't allow the men to stay, saying there's no guarantee they are not spies. But neither does it want to send them back home.

The UNHCR recommended the men to Canada because this nation is regarded internationally as "a country of resettlement." It is not unusual for the agency to ask Canada to consider admitting refugees who are in diplomatic limbo, she added.

Officials last week attempted to allay fears that Canada would be admitting Israel's enemies, including terrorists.

Should Canada proceed, the 10 men would be subject to a strict screening process, said Rene Mercier of Citizenship and Immigration Canada.

Canada's screening is "serious. We will not take people with a criminal background.

"They would have to meet criteria like any other refugee [applicant]," including checks into health and backgrounds, Mercier said.

The same view was sounded by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien last week. The refugees "will have to be processed the same way as any other refugees who come to Canada.

"The law does not permit us to take people who could be a threat to the security of Canada," Chrétien said while in Rome.

Mercier said Canada is simply reviewing the cases: "We have not been accepting refugees. We are looking at the possibility of accepting them. Either we accept some or we don't. If we do, they will be coming."

Champassak said that if Canada rejects the asylum-seekers, another country will be asked to accept them.

In January, Israel reportedly asked Canada to grant political asylum to a Syrian and an Iranian held in an Israeli jail.

Israel's High Court of Justice heard a petition from the two, who were seeking their release after having infiltrated Israel several years earlier.

Moshe Ronen, the new president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), said he's confident that this country's "checks and balances" on immigration and refugees will work.

"It's a pretty tight system, [which] gives us some assurances that the government is doing the right thing," Ronen said.

In a statement, B'nai Brith Canada said it trusts that each case "will be subject to the government's careful screening procedures to ensure that [the detainees], should they be admitted, will in no way be a threat to the people of Canada."

According to a recent article in the Jerusalem Report, dozens of Arab nationals steal into Israel each year to ask for asylum. By 1995, the total included 30 Iraqis, 24 of whom were released from jail and given residency permits.

Rabbi Pachino leaving CHAT after 19 years as headmaster

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Marvin Pachino

TORONTO — Although he has energetic plans to study, write and travel, Rabbi Marvin Pachino finds the prospect of retiring as headmaster of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) "strange and unreal."

But he can leave proud of the fact that "I have been able to develop a school where the sense of family is strong.

"There is a cohesiveness and esprit de corps in both the faculty and the student body – a warm, caring and giving atmosphere," he told The CJN.

Rabbi Pachino will be honored by the officers and board of directors of CHAT at a tribute dinner on June 2, at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill.

The Baltimore-born and raised Yeshiva University graduate (he earned both a BA in psychology and smichah, rabbinic ordination, there, as well as a MEd from Antioch College) spent 14 years in the pulpit rabbinate, moving from Lewistown, Pa., to Des Moines, Iowa, to South Bend, Ind., to Montreal's Congregation Chevra Kadisha B'nai Jacob .

"I was always active in teaching or coordinating Hebrew school," he said, and "in Montreal I also taught at Herzliah High School."

In 1973, he became assistant principal of the Ida Crown Jewish Academy in Chicago, a post he held until he came to CHAT in 1979 as headmaster.

(The title "headmaster," Rabbi Pachino explained, was chosen to indicate that "the person holding that title was the administrative head of the school, as opposed to having both a general studies and Hebrew principal. Although Rabbi Pachino is in charge of the Hebrew studies part of the program, there is still a general studies principal.)

Rabbi Pachino joined the school when it moved to its present location on Wilmington in Bathurst Manor in 1979. Before, he explained, it was loosely connected to Associated Hebrew Schools, and was located at its Neptune branch.

"When I came," the rabbi recalled, "we just occupied a fraction of the building. There were 229 students – our registration for 1998-1999 is already 1,870."

The bulk of the incoming student body is from the feeder schools, Associated, Bialik, United Synagogue Day Schools and Leo Baeck, he said.

As well, in the last several years, CHAT has been able to integrate children from She'arim, a day school for children with learning disabilities, along with a small number from the public schools.

Rabbi Pachino attributes this growth to several factors. First, he said, "we established our credibility as a solid academic secondary institution, with an excellent and a professional staff who have good rapport with the students, have a collegial attitude and are loyal to the school and to each other."

He noted that the school "looks for the best teachers." A number have master's or doctor's degrees, and are specialists in their fields. Physics teacher Dr. Eli Honig, for instance, also teaches at the University of Toronto, and Alex Gropper, who teaches history, is an active archeologist.

"In the Jewish history department, two out of the five teachers have doctorates, and one has a master's," he said.

The education level is very high, and very demanding, he said. Still, or perhaps because of that, "there is a sense of pride in the school, which is a source of pride to me too."

CHAT is the only secondary Jewish day school with an independent, fully staffed guidance department. Rabbi Chaim Sacknowitz, who has headed it for some 25 years, told The CJN that he and the other two full-time guidance staff people (next year there will be one more) offer academic and peer counselling, peer tutoring, university preparation, study skills instruction and social programs.

Special programs include an upcoming one on eating disorders, PAD (Parents Against Drugs), where specially trained grade 10 and 11 students speak to the feeder schools about the dangers of drugs, and a recent theatrical production called Heroes, where feeder schools were invited to learn about safety concerns.

Many of the Grade 9 registrants have chosen CHAT because "their brother, or their sister, or their friend had a good experience here," Rabbi Pachino said.

A number of graduates have gone on to post-secondary education, some to careers in the rabbinate or in Jewish education, he said.

Jewish education, he said, "is not the ideal that Jewish parents have for their children." The community also doesn't enhance the status of teachers, he charged, adding that no one is "doing what they should be doing to encourage kids who want to go into this field."

Across the continent, the upshot of that situation is that while enrolment in the day school system is growing significantly, the number of qualified teachers necessary to teach them is not increasing proportionately, he said.

On the other hand, Rabbi Pachino said that he doesn't know how much more growth there can be in Toronto. "We already have the largest per capita enrolment of kids in the Jewish day school system of any city on the continent."

Nevertheless, he said, CHAT is going ahead with plans to build a new facility on the grounds of the Bathurst Jewish Centre. Construction is expected to start in the fall, he said.

Looking back over his years in the education field, Rabbi Pachino mused that there have been definite changes in students. "As the world changed, so students changed too," he said wryly, saying he was referring to their "attitude toward life, ethics, morals – they are all influenced by the outside culture."

This is mirrored by their dress, how they speak and the language they use, he said.

"Society today is non-judgemental, in that it is reluctant to categorically establish moral and ethical norms, to establish a universally accepted standard of right and wrong."

So too, he said, kids are reluctant to take strong moral and ethical positions, and declare that some behavior is wrong, immoral or of questionable value. They are reared in an atmosphere where everyone is entitled to do their own thing."

He especially decried the unwillingness of youngsters "to stand up and state unequivocally that Israel has a right to exist."

For instance, he said, 10 or 15 years ago, "no kid would be pushing for someone from the PLO to come and present their side [of the conflict] – they knew who the enemy was."

CHAT, he said, however, "has no serious discipline problems. Maybe [it is because] we have a pattern of relating more."

Mideast peace a reality in Israeli 'Master Plan'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The National Master Plan for Israel, as well as the longer-term plan, Israel 2025, reflect the hoped for reality of an Israel at peace with its neighbors and within secure borders, according to Arie Shachar, professor of urban geography and urban planning at Hebrew University.

Shachar, who helped prepare the plans, is also chair of the advisory committee of the Israeli Central Bureau of Statistics and director of the Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies at Hebrew University.

He was giving the keynote address at Israel and the University of Toronto: celebrating academic partnerships, a program at Hart House devoted to scholarly links between Israel and the U of T.

Government policy since the establishment of the state, he said, has been formulated on the idea that security and land are the most important things.

Because Israel is such a small country (and was even smaller in 1948), occupying and settling the land was considered basic. The Israel Land Authority kept tight control over land use, as other government bodies did with public housing; building and infrastructure, such as ports, roads and telecommunications; and capital investment.

Immigrants were directed to whatever location was considered strategic at the time, for example, the Negev, he said.

"Individual choice, economic considerations and social factors simply didn't play a large role [in government thinking]" Shachar said.

Much of the new thinking is a result of the huge influx of immigrants from the Former Soviet Union, nearly a million people, which led to many shortages, especially in housing.

For the first time, Shachar said, new immigrants were allowed to freely choose their place of residence. "A high proportion went, not to outlying, strategically significant areas, but to the central region, where employment possibilities and opportunities were greater.

"The new plan abandons the importance of the small town in favor of large metropolitan areas.

"The signing of peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan has led to less danger on those borders and thus a decreased importance of settlements in those areas."

Along with the increased demand for housing, as well as the refusal by new immigrants to settle for poor housing, there is a wave of new infrastructure, such as the expansion of Ben-Gurion airport, new military camps for soldiers who are withdrawn from the territories and from, for instance, the Golan, and a new coastal highway.

There is an increased awareness of environmental dangers, Shachar said, which has led to new policies aimed at containing urban sprawl and maintaining open spaces, as opposed to the old emphasis on converting agricultural space to urban use.

As well, there has been a change in the economy from largely agricultural to high-tech, especially in the country's core.

The government, he said, "no longer seeks to influence the economy, but rather wants to promote sites and infrastructure to meet the demands of a new economy facing global competition."

The new plans, he said, assume that there will be more and more specialization, especially in high-tech, computer and biotechnical fields.

All these new plans, however, are predicated on peace with the Palestinians and Arab countries and on the pursuit of social justice, Shachar warned.

Other sessions at the conference highlighted specific links between the university and Israel, such as Telink, a system of telecommunications and teleconferencing that enables physicians in Toronto to examine patients and procedures in Israel; research in, for instance, cancer, genetics, pain, dental techniques; and the exchange of students and researchers and information.

The Halbert fellowships established by Ralph and Roz Halbert enable visiting professorship exchanges between Canada and Israel in such diverse fields as law, political science and psychology.

Understandable anger, misguided expression

Canada is precious. It represents the highest of human values embodied in a way of life that combines freedom with law, that reconciles rights and responsibilities, that accommodates the uniqueness of the individual with the pre-eminence of the community.

That is simply one of the reasons among the very many, why it is so important to engage the forces, as The CJN does on every appropriate occasion, intent on Canada's dismemberment.

This newspaper is unreservedly federalist. It carries no brief for separatism or for separatists. But the public outcry over the recent hiring of David Levine to administer the Ottawa Hospital is a misguided expression of people's understandable anger.

There is no doubt about Levine's politics. He is a separatist. He was a defeated candidate for the Parti Québécois in a 1979 by-election and is currently the agent-general for Quebec in New York.

We deplore his politics.

But his politics should not be a bar to his employment at the Ottawa Hospital. This proposition is not merely a statement of editorial opinion. It is a statement of Canadian law. It is, in and of itself, one of those "highest of human ideals" that confer value and goodness to the way of life that we hold so dear in the country that we regard so proudly as the exemplar of those ideals.Indeed, that proposition is one of the fundamental freedoms of Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

"Sec. 2. Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms: (b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression..."

In addition, the Human Rights Code of Ontario also ensures that Levine, like everyone else in Ontario, has a right to employment without fear of discrimination on account of his beliefs.

"Sec. 4(1) Every person has a right to equal treatment with respect to employment without discrimination because of race, ancestry, place of origin, citizenship, creed, sex, sexual orientation, age, record of offences, marital status, family status or handicap."

We assume Levine's selection by the executive search firm was bona fide, that he is a man of integrity, that he will fulfil his responsibilities to the best of his abilities and that he will not use his position to advance his political loyalties.

Therefore, if our values are indeed true, and our laws meaningful, no one should try to prevent him from assuming his position at the hospital in July. To object to his employment on the basis of his political beliefs is to ignore Canadian law and to debase "Canadian" values, high among which is the right of every individual to believe what he or she wishes without fear that they will be punished for their beliefs.

It is an understandably indignant, but doubly ironic ill-wind, which animates the enraged passions of those who are urging Levine's dismissal. They are purporting to stand up against the separatists but are in truth merely feeding the constantly grinding mill of separatist propaganda.

They are purporting to stand up on behalf of Canada but are in truth, betraying Canada, and by doing so diminishing it ever so slightly to a place that would be governed by mob rage and anger rather than by freedoms and the law.

That would not be the Canada that we know to be so precious.

Claims coverage of Bouchard speech distorted

As president of the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region, and chair of the dinner honoring Israel's 50th birthday, and as a responsible communal leader, I am compelled to inform you that the English language report in the May 14 issue of The CJN was a distorted version of the sense and mood of the actual events. Your French reporting, on the other hand, in complete contrast with the English article, reflected truthfully both the profile and spirit of the evening's proceedings.

Premier Lucien Bouchard's address and his presence, as did that of all our guests, focused on honoring Israel on its 50th anniversary. It is amazing that The CJN is capable of capturing faithfully in Elias Levy's article the evening's essence and mood as to speakers, audience and musical theme, while the report in English was tendentious and unequivocally unfaithful to the occasion and its proceedings.

The purpose of the function was to honor Israel, whereas your headline must be regarded as either tendentious, malicious or both. Innumerable communal leaders, including Liberal Mount Royal MP Sheila Finestone, complimented Bouchard's praise of Israel: "a very eloquent text... I was very moved by what he had to say."

To have focused in your headline on the fact that Bouchard called on Israel to accommodate the Palestinians as the essential component of his address, would also be in contradiction with the understanding of the 600 people who were present. The cornerstone of the evening's speeches, the mood and the musical program were all characterized by the warm and cordial feelings of admiration for Israel on its 50th jubilee. To focus on any other theme is fallacious reporting.

The English version of your newspaper's report of the 50th Anniversary Gala was an injustice to the Montreal Jewish community who came to celebrate with friends of Israel, Israel's 50th anniversary.

Poor record on war crimes justifies CJC stand

Peter Kremer, the former director of the Canadian Justice Department War Crimes Section, takes solace from the McCamus report, which concluded that there was no evidence of anti-Semitism within the unit whose task it is to bring Nazi war criminals to justice. (CJN, April 30)

We never asserted that Kremer was anti-Semitic, nor do we allege that that was a reason for the abysmal performance of the unit during his watch. The record of the war crimes unit under Kremer's direction speaks for itself.

During his tenure from 1990 to 1995, all war crimes prosecutions were either lost or withdrawn. It was only at the very end of his assignment that the first denaturalization cases were brought forward. In cases as time sensitive as those relating to Nazi war criminals, more than four years of preparation before bringing a case to trial raises serious questions. We believe we have the answer to those questions, and it is also found within the McCamus report, but not referred to by Kremer in his letter. This relates to Kremer's attitude toward war crimes cases, made crystal clear to me in a 1991 meeting when he said that he would not be "sticking his neck out" in these cases the way his predecessor (Bill Hobson) did.

This is the crux of the matter and the results – or rather the lack thereof – are readily explicable in that context. It has almost become trite to say so, but the proverbial "fire in the belly" that was the hallmark of the unit from 1987 to 1990 under the direction of Hobson and Arnold Fradkin was glaringly absent for five years thereafter.

We are gratified that the War Crimes Section currently has more than 14 cases relating to Nazi war crimes ongoing or resolved, with more expected. Canadian Jewish Congress is pleased to salute good work, but we have struggled too long and hard on this issue of justice and morality to shrink from registering criticism in its absence.

Who was at this 1946 seder in Munich?

On April 15 and 16, at the first Pesach celebrated after VE-Day and the liberation of the camps, seders were celebrated in the city centre of Munich at a public facility (the Deutsches Theatre Restaurant), for survivors of the Shoah then living in the city. The service was conducted by an American army chaplain, Rabbi Abraham J. Klausner. As part of these seders, there was a Haggadah, in both Hebrew and Yiddish – or rather a pamphlet described as a "supplement" to the Haggadah. The Haggadah identified itself as "arranged and illustrated by Y[oseph] D[avid] Sheinson," with woodcuts by "Ben Benyamin."

Two years ago this Pesach, I discovered among my late father's papers a copy of this Haggadah, inscribed to him with thanks on behalf of the DPs by a joint staff member (Joe Levine) in Munich at the time. I took it that the inscription was made to my father, Ben Touster, in the early '50s in his capacity as president of HIAS.

I have traced Rabbi Klausner, still alive and clear of mind, and I have learned many details of these events. But there are still many gaps in our knowledge. Y.D. Sheinson has been traced to Montreal; and he appears to have been alive at 80 in the 1986 Lexicon of Yiddish Writers. Is he still alive? Or where are his surviving family? Who is "Ben Benyamin?" Can any of your readers provide more information?

Neo-Nazis march in Germany

By TIBOR KRAUSZ

The German town of Jena once earned great international fame for its exquisite chinaware. Today, the town has a reputation for wares of a different kind. In Germany, at least, Jena is becoming a byword, not only for porcelain figurines, but also for homemade swastikas and other Nazi regalia, which are in great demand in some eastern parts of the country.

A tranquil university town in Thuringia state in the former German Democratic Republic (GDR), Jena is fast becoming a stronghold of neo-Nazism. And by no means the only one. Support for neo-Nazi ideology is sweeping across large swaths of the formerly communist East Germany, effectively making whole regions off-limits to foreigners and imposing curfews on visible minorities. Given over to the hatred of anyone "un-German," an increasing number of small-town and inner-city young people are dedicated to turning parts of Germany into an Auslander-frei (outsider-free) zone, say German sociologists and social workers.

Tacit sympathy or overt support for rabidly xenophobic views, especially among the under-30s, has become common in many villages, small towns and urban districts across eastern Germany. German social workers estimate that at least a third of those between 15 and 25 identify with neo-Nazism or other forms of extreme right-wing ideology.

By far the worst affected area is Brandenburg, where German authorities have already categorized nine regional towns as neo-Nazi dens, and foreign, mostly Turkish, guest workers are increasingly becoming prey to racial violence but non-white tourists, too, have routinely been targeted.

So far, however, the prevaling neo-Nazism has not translated into the kind of virulent anti-Semitism that spawned Nazi ideology in the 1920s, if only because so few Jews have remained in Germany – 30,000 at the last count. In addition, as a result of the painful memories of the Holocaust, the German government remains vigilant toward anti-Semitic manifestations. All Nazi regalia are banned by law in Germany, and the dissemination of Nazi propaganda and Holocaust denial carries with it years of imprisonment and hefty fines.

German authorities clamp down on the distributors of hate propaganda with utmost severity. Last year, the German government came in for a lot of flak from international citizens of cyberspace because it blocked the reception of an American Internet service provider for allowing hate literature to circulate on its servers. But if they can no longer spew their bile into cyberspace, some German anti-Semites have fallen back on a well-tested substitute.

With spray cans at the ready, they defile Jewish gravestones and "redecorate" the facades of public buildings. Yet by many accounts, the occasional spray-painted swastikas and anti-Semitic graffiti on the walls of synagogues and Jewish community centres are more an irritant to groundskeepers who have to clean them up than they are a palpable threat to the well-being of German Jews.

Anti-Semitism is not extinct in the ranks of the German right, but so far, anti-Jewish sentiments have usually fizzled out in the pranks of self-styled graffiti artists and Holocaust-denying pamphleteers. Yet, while it would be stretching it to read too much into isolated and mostly non-violent manifestations of anti-Jewish sentiments in Germany, the writing is on the wall for all to see, literally and figuratively.

Ignatz Bubis, the head of Germany's Jewish community, said in a recent article in the British daily, the Guardian: "What could emerge in the next two, three or five years could be very dangerous."

Just how dangerous can be seen in the figures. In 1997, there was an average of one violent racially motivated attack every week in Brandenburg, and a further 148 recorded racist assaults elsewhere during the year. Seven million of Germany's 78.5 million people are foreign by origin, and even though only about 1.5 percent of them reside in eastern Germany, the reported number of racially motivated attacks against foreigners in east Berlin stands five times higher than in the western part of the formerly divided city. Last year, there was a 25 percent increase nation-wide in the number of recorded racist attacks, while other extreme right offences, such as the distribution of forbidden Nazi ideology, soared 34 percent to 11,720 cases.

And the situation will likely get worse, German authorities predict. Nationally, the German extreme right increased its membership by 14 percent last year alone. The German police currently estimate the number of active neo-Nazis at around 47,000, a 4.5 percent increase over the previous year, and the number is growing in the east.

But the acknowledged figures represent only the hard core of the extreme right – those skinheads who openly flaunt their views and are itching to take a swing with their clubs and baseball bats at the first opportunity. Though this hard core comprises mostly people in their teens and 20s, in the east, many of the older generation also seem prone to Nazi ideology, often tacitly endorsing violence against foreigners or turning a blind eye to it.

Except for a few sporadic reports, however, this phenomenon goes largely unreported in the international media. Many of the German political elite also failed to take notice until late April, when the extreme right-wing German People's Union party (DVU) received 13 percent of the votes in the regional election in the state of Saxony-Anhalt. The DVU is run by Gerhard Frey, a neo-Nazi Munich-based millionaire publisher who has made a fortune printing rightist material and is friendly with such other ultra-nationalists as the Russian Vladimir Zhirinovsky and the French Jean-Marie Le Pen. Frey's party was contesting its first election in the state and ended up being the third-largest party in the parliament of Magdeburg, the state capital of Saxony-Anhalt.

Many commentators have attributed the DVU's victory to the inability of Chancellor Helmut Kohl to grapple with the severe socio-economic malaise that continues to afflict east Germany more than eight years after reunification, despite the $800 million (US) that have been poured into the east's dilapidated infrastructure since 1991.

In many parts of the east, chronic unemployment continues to remain double the national post-war record of 12 percent. Saxony-Anhalt's official unemployment rate is 22.6 percent against the backdrop of 0.6 economic growth rate, but the real jobless rate is more likely to be around 40 percent once temporary jobs and restraining measures are factored in. Since 1991, some three million jobs have been lost in the six eastern states with a combined population of 18 million.

But if a concentrated federal government policy is lacking, some regional authorities are doing their utmost to rein in the pervasive racist violence. In a bid to combat neo-Nazi brutality, the Brandenburg regional police have launched a helicopter-borne action unit of 35 officers to swoop down on fascist gangs, literally out of the blue. Yet even such regional initiatives will have little effect until the federal government takes a series of long-awaited steps to ease the strain on east Germany's laggard economy.

Many inefficient factories, formerly the backbone of East Germany's economy, failed after reunification in 1989, with resulting soaring unemployment. Many east Germans were thus drawn into a society of plenty with the feeling of having even less of their own than before. In absolute terms, their standard of living has risen rapidly over the past eight years. Most households now have modern western-made cars, color televisions and other appliances that were unimaginable luxuries even a decade ago. But their relative deprivation compared to their brethren in the western part of the country is still a painful thorn in the sides of many.

Whereas the Christian Democratic government of Chancellor Helmut Kohl has made strenuous efforts to redress such inequalities, many people in the east still feel that it has not done nearly enough to encourage the robust west German industry to locate in the east. The psychological backlash has evidenced itself most visibly among the working-class youth who inhabit the very same strata of society that once formed the rank and file of the Nazi party.

Yet more than just disaffection with economics, the upsurge of neo-Nazism may reflect a return to an all-too-familiar stage in German politics: not just left versus right but xenophobic nationalist versus Europe-oriented internationalist. In the Communist GDR, people had little exposure to the democratic pluralism that has shaped non-communist countries in western Europe, the Democratic Federal Republic included. And eight years of democracy seem to have been far from enough for pluralistic values to take root immovably.

Then combine that with teenage angst. Neo-Nazism had been a provocative form of youth protest in the Communist east long before the Berlin Wall came down. Yet despite hopes for the opposite, neo-Nazism has waxed, not waned, in east Germany since 1990.

But even western Germany has not been immune to xenophobia and racist ideology. Rightist groups in the west have latched happily onto the growing radicalization of the east and are welcoming eastern reinforcements with open arms. Thanks to the great boost in their following, extremist and racist parties now stand to influence the mainstream political agenda in the federal elections slated for Sept. 27.

Recently, Defence Minister Volker Ruhe has reluctantly had to approve an inquiry into the spread of neo-Nazi propaganda in the German army, as some junior officers were discovered distributing neo-Nazi propaganda and schooling recruits in the virtues of "a racially pure" Germany.

Meanwhile, in some towns like Jena, neo-Nazi thugs are escalating violence, using explosives instead of baseball bats. In late January, police there discovered a crude bomb factory after intensive investigation into an incident last September, when a suitcase bearing a swastika and containing enough explosives to maim and kill was discovered outside a theatre in downtown Jena.

Soon, it may take German Jewry more than just some clean-up work to wipe the writing off the wall.

An incitement to violence

The violence with which the Palestinians marked 50 years since Israeli independence is a clear indication of the failure of the Middle East peace process. On May 14, the Palestinians marked al-Naqba – the "catastrophe."

By Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Inspired by the celebrations and international attention that Israel's 50th anniversary attracted, the Palestinians created their own media events, hoping to get (and succeeding in getting) sympathy, making Israel look bad, and adding more martyrs.

For months, the Palestinian Authority (PA), which Israel accepted as part of the peace process, has been preparing for this event. The central theme is that the establishment of Israel was illegitimate, based on "stolen Arab land" and the support of the Western "colonialist" powers. The message is clear: Since Israel was established by force on "Arab land," the Palestinians are justified in turning to violence and terrorism in order to correct the historic injustice. Now, as in 1948, the Palestinians ignored the fact that if the Arabs had accepted the United Nations partition plan creating two states, the violence would have been avoided.

The preparations for the commemoration of al-Naqba were an incitement to violence against Israeli targets. As a result, thousands of Palestinians throwing stones and firebombs went on a rampage, attacking Israeli checkpoints and roadblocks outside settlements in Gaza and in the West Bank (Judea and Samaria). The tens of thousands of Palestinian police were nowhere to be seen, except where they joined the mobs. When the Israeli troops were attacked, they had no choice but to defend themselves, leading to the deaths and injuries.

The Palestinians got what they wanted – more martyrs for the cause, news clips with Israeli soldiers firing at "innocent victims" and international condemnation of Israel. PA officials blamed the "massacre" on Israel, claiming that troops shot wildly at peaceful Palestinian demonstrators.

In addition to the continued violence, the Palestinians also demonstrated that for them, the creation of Israel 50 years ago remains "a catastrophe."

At the beginning of the peace process, during the Oslo talks and afterwards, both sides agreed to put history behind them. The logic was that if Israelis and Palestinians continue to blame each other for the violence and warfare over the past five decades, they will never be able to live together. For this entire period, the conflict was kept alive by the Arab effort to demonize Israel as an illegitimate state. This demonization and denial of legitimacy, in turn, fuelled and continues to fuel Palestinian terrorism and hatred.

Israel has kept its end of the deal, forgetting the acts of terrorism and murder committed by Yasser Arafat and other prominent Palestinians.

However, in this, as in many other areas, the Palestinians have systematically violated their commitments under the Oslo accords. There has been no change in the language of the Palestinian leadership or their policies. Israel is still seen as illegitimate, the result of the usurpation of "Palestinian rights." The Palestinians are portrayed as the victims, while the Jews and Israel are the aggressors and "colonialists."

In his speech commemorating "the catastrophe," Arafat noted the "half-century of wounds and pain in our modern history," and declared: "The Naqba has thrown us out of homes and dispersed us around the globe. Historians may search, but they will not find any nation subjugated to as much torture as ours."

This combination of incitement and violence are not unusual and cannot be simply dismissed as a sign of Palestinian frustration with what they see as the slow progress of the peace process. Rather, this behavior has been consistent from the first days after the Oslo agreement was signed in September 1993.

To make real progress, the Palestinian leadership, beginning with Arafat, must publicly acknowledge the legitimacy of Israel, and end the constant propaganda and incitement that feeds terrorism. This is the basis for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's insistence on the unambiguous and public repeal of those sections in the Palestinian Covenant that call for the destruction of Israel and deny the legitimacy of the Jewish state. Such a public move by the Palestinian National Council would be a small step in the right direction.

As long as this distortion of history and denial of the historic rights of the Jewish people to sovereignty in at least part of the Land of Israel continues, there is no possibility for peaceful coexistence and mutual acceptance. The peace process faces enough obstacles without the campaign to commemorate the 50th anniversary of "the catastrophe."

Eurovision exposes Israeli differences

It takes a mighty big story to hog the headlines from the victory of Beitar Yerushalayim in the National Soccer League championship. Earlier this month, a few hours after thousands of Beitar fans stormed the field of Jerusalem's Teddy Stadium in ecstasy over their team's 1-0 defeat of Maccabi Petah Tikva, millions of Israelis were glued to their TV sets in suspense over a different kind of competition.

By Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

The next morning, the lead story in newspapers and the main topic of radio talk shows and office conversations was Israel's victory in Eurovision in Birmingham, England. Israelis, especially the fanatic supporters of Beitar, take their soccer seriously. But the nation takes even more seriously an annual European song contest in which Israel competes every year against 24 countries.

Beitar's on-field exploits proved no match for the surprise triumph of a maligned transsexual in the final seconds of the Eurovision competition.

Israel's victory proved only the beginning of a huge story that spoke volumes about the state of the nation. In subsequent days, in typically Israeli fashion, the achievement was lost in a clamor of controversy and political debate. It played into a larger, increasingly bitter dispute between the secular and Orthodox segments of society. Like most issues in Israel, it was fair game for politicians always quick to quarrel.

To most North Americans in Israel, almost all of whom had never heard of Eurovision before moving here, the event's massive appeal defies comprehension. A sugary tribute to musical kitsch and mediocrity, Eurovision never fails to command the nation's attention. Although considered by many an anachronism and a monument to bad taste, the three-hour live broadcast of Eurovision attracts astronomically high TV ratings in Israel.

This year, Israel injected a new dimension into the competition by choosing a gender-bending singer by the unlikely name of Dana International to represent the Jewish state.

Already last fall, Dana's nomination as Israel's contestant was greeted with derision in many circles. Music critics dismissed her as a lightweight, while haredi Knesset members said having a woman who used to be a man represent Israel, especially on its 50th anniversary, was a "shame and abomination."

But Dana has never been easily deterred. Three years ago, she came close in her first attempt to represent Israel in Eurovision. In 1993, the former Yaron Cohen, who first gained prominence as a female impersonator in Tel Aviv nightclubs, underwent a sex change operation in London and became Dana International.

Today she is a household name in Israel and beyond, thanks to her performance of a vaguely catchy dance tune called Diva, which brought home the trophy in dramatic fashion. For the first time in Eurovision's 43-year history, favorite singers were chosen by television viewers in participating countries in telephone voting polls. In previous years, winners were picked by national juries. This time, voting was tense right until the end, with first place shifting between Israel, Britain and Malta until the final votes were cast by Macedonia.

Israel's pride over its victory was quickly overshadowed by a heated argument between secular and religious politicians. The country's Orthodox establishment denounced Dana as a decadent disgrace to the Jewish state.

Shas Knesset member Shlomo Benizri lamented: "In order to win the Eurovision, we had to send a gimmick. It's a sign of the bankruptcy of Israeli song."

The secular side responded with a volley of complaints about religious intolerance and narrow-mindedness. Upon her return from England, Dana found herself in the midst of the latest chapter in the growing rift over religious coercion, civil liberties and artistic freedom.

Part of the controversy centred on plans to hold next year's Eurovision in Jerusalem. The city's haredi deputy mayor Haim Miller voiced fierce opposition, saying such spectacles should "stay in gentile countries."

Mayor Ehud Olmert called his deputy a "blabbermouth," and in a memorable political put-down, replied, "What Miller says, at most, represents only himself and even that I'm not sure about."

Miller issued a veiled threat ahead of municipal elections to be held in November: "Mayor Olmert would do well to remember he owes his job to Orthodox Jewish voters."

Although the Dana dispute provided a refreshing diversion from the more gnawing problems of the troubled peace process, it was yet another disturbing reminder of how increasingly polarized Israel is. As the secular majority and Orthodox minority grow further apart, even a seemingly innocuous song contest can trigger political noises that are anything but melodious.

How God responds to prayer

My friend Dennis Prager, widely known California broadcaster and erstwhile director of the Brandeis-Bardin Institute, is also a prolific writer. He has published some popular books on Judaism and issues a bi-weekly newsletter entitled the Prager Perspective. It brings the reader a discussion of provocative subjects, and the author never fails to inject a highly personal perspective into the argument. He excels in logical deduction and careful dissection of opposing points of view, and then comes down clearly and most often persuasively on one or the other side.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Baseball lovers will remember the dramatic home run that Joe Carter hit for Toronto's Blue Jays in the World Series some years ago. And another former Blue Jay, Tony Fernandez, was the hero in the Cleveland Indians' win of last year's American League pennant race. He hit a home run in the 11th inning of the deciding game. Afterwards, he said, "I believe that the Lord arbitrated it this way, he wanted to make me play for some reason and I did."

Here Prager begins his discussion: "As fate would have it, however, just two weeks later in the 12th and final inning of the final game of the World Series, it was Tony Fernandez who committed the fielding error that led to his team's losing the World Series against the Florida Marlins. I wonder what Mr. Fernandez believed about God's arbitration after the game."

Prager too believes in that God intervenes in personal lives and he approves of Tony's speaking to the press about his personal belief. But he does not overlook the problems.

"One is the tendency of many of us who believe in Divine intervention in individuals' lives to do so only when things go well. While we cannot know what he believes in his heart, we do know that Mr. Fernandez did not tell the press after the final World Series game that God arbitrated that he play the way he did in that game. The question then is this: Are we right or wrong in assuming that God intervenes in our lives only when things turn out well?"

Among the multiple problems that this whole issue raises is the question of how God responds to personal prayer when such prayer negatively affects the fate of other people. If I pray to get a certain job, I am by implication also praying that God should make sure that nobody else gets that job. If I pray for sunshine to bless me on a certain day, I am by implication also praying that rain will not fall on parched fields that need it more than I do. "If I pray," says Prager, "that the child hurt in a school bus crash not be my child, I am also praying that the child who was hurt be some other parents' child."

So how should Tony Fernandez have prayed, given his particular form of belief in God. Prager suggests this, and I leave you with his suggestion: "I don't know if God actually influences the outcome of baseball games, but I do know that I am a very fortunate person to have been given the ability to play professional baseball, and I thank God for this and all His other blessings."

The Kirshner File

Bennett relishes role as Canadian publisher

To the casual observer, publishing and real estate development seem eons apart, constellations which cannot meet.

By Sheldon Kirshner

But to Avie Bennett, who should know, the two disparate fields are remarkably identical.

Bennett, you see, wears two hats. For the past 13 years, he has been chair, president and chief executive officer of McClelland & Stewart, Canada's oldest as well as largest publishing house.

Yet long before he bought this august bastion of Canadian arts and letters, he was a real estate developer, the scion of a Toronto family which, in the 1950s, was reportedly the biggest commercial landlord in this country, with properties stretching from coast to coast.

Even today, as chair and president of First Plazas Inc., Bennett dabbles in real estate. He sold the bulk of his holdings in 1987, when the market was still sizzling, leaving himself a shopping centre and interests in several choice buildings, including one near Chinatown which serves as McClelland & Stewart's impressive headquarters.

A fairly tall, robust-looking man of 70, Bennett sits behind a big, uncluttered desk in an airy, book-lined office filled with framed photographs of his family and of Canadian and international public figures from Jean Chretien to Mikhail Gorbachev.

The ninth-floor room is the nerve centre of McClelland & Stewart, which publishes about 100 titles annually and whose authors include Margaret Atwood, Leonard Cohen, Alice Munro, Margaret Laurence, A.M. Klein, Pierre Berton and Robertson Davies.

Bennett, who had been a member of McClelland & Stewart's board, purchased the venerable company when it teetered on bankruptcy.

To Bennett, it seemed like a case of deja vu. In 1963, the family business, Principal Investments, founded by his father, three uncles and grandfather during the Depression, plunged into receivership after decades of immense success. Paying off more than $1 million in personal guarantees, Bennett went on from there to establish First Plazas, which today requires little of his attention.

Asked why he acquired McClelland & Stewart, he said flippantly, "Because it was there." Leaning forward slightly, he turned more serious. " Jack McClelland said he was ready to sell, and I surprised myself by saying I'd be interested. I felt that McClelland & Stewart was an important cultural institution which needed financing to keep it going. It was an impetuous decision, but one I haven't regretted at all."

When I asked him whether, as a Jew, he could have bought McClelland & Stewart 40 or 50 years ago, his reply was immediate. "Probably not, though I had never thought about it."

Pausing momentarily, he observed: "I was brought up with a great deal of cognizance about discrimination."

Archie, his Belarus-born father, was a gold medalist in English and philosophy at Queen's University. Yet he never realized his dream of becoming a university professor. Jews were denied such posts during his era.

Stymied by anti-Semitism, he and his brothers made a fortune in real estate, constructing the Sunnybrook Plaza in Toronto, the first shopping centre in Canada, and the majority of theatres in the Famous Players chain.

Bennett himself, raised in Forest Hills when few Jewish families lived in that posh neighborhood, still has vivid memories of the fist fights he got into with local bigots as he walked to school.

"The worst of the anti-Semitism, for me, stopped in 1939, when the bullies joined the army."

At the height of World War II, Bennett enrolled at the University of Toronto. He was not a studious student, and failed to pass the four-year course.

"I studied bridge, reading, basketball, girls, political science and economics. I don't think university would have made any difference in my life. There are a lot of things you can get out of university without a degree. I spent many hours in the library immersing myself in 20th century novels. I went to concerts and art exhibitions. It was not a complete waste of time."

Fresh out of university, he joined Principal Investments, whose holdings ultimately were part of an empire of 35 shopping centres, vacant land and buildings allegedly worth $200 million.

Nowadays, Bennett – who holds two honorary university degrees and is an officer in the Order of Canada – considers himself a publisher, not an entrepreneur. With the benefit of hindsight, he evinces uncanny similarities between publishing and real estate development.

"They're both businesses where you can see the fruits of your labor in a tangible way. You're developing a book – and a building – and you're marketing and selling it. And just as no two real estate deals are the same, each book is different."

Since acquiring McClelland & Stewart, Bennett has made no major changes. But in 1991, he bought The Canadian Encyclopedia and The Junior Encyclopedia from Mel Hurtig. And of late, he has expanded into CD-Roms.

A fast and avid reader, he reads virtually every book published by McClelland & Stewart, and, he's proud to say, always receives the first copy hot off the press.

He has vetoed publication of a few books, more on economic than on editorial grounds. An amiable but private individual, he is loathe to elaborate, but adds, "Let's just say I wouldn't publish a book by Ernst Zundel."

Similarly, he declines to disclose his favorite McClelland & Stewart books. "That's like asking me to name my favorite child," said Bennett, whose wife Beverly and himself have six grown children.

However, he does enjoy political and sports biographies. "I have difficulty with poetry," he allows.

As a rule, McClelland & Stewart does not publish books aimed at a Jewish audience. But lately, there have been volumes about Mt. Sinai Hospital and the Holocaust, the second of which was edited by Senator Jerry Grafstein. In addition, McClelland & Stewart was the publisher of Anne Michaels' acclaimed novel of the Holocaust, Fugitive Pieces.

Bennett is an acknowledged patron of the arts, and through the Bennett Family Foundation, has helped the National Ballet of Canada and small theatre and dance troupes. Some years ago, he donated funds for a native studies program at the University of Toronto.

Last month, he was appointed chancellor of York University, a ceremonial three-year position. He will officially be inducted on May 29, and looks forward to the contributions he can make. "It will be very rewarding."

Bennett's father headed the Central Region of Canadian Jewish Congress for many years. Bennett himself is not formally involved in Jewish community affairs but he gave generously when a chair in Jewish studies at Queen's University, his dad's alma mater, was established.

Although Bennett has reached the biblical age of three score and ten, he has no intention whatsoever of retiring.

"I'm in terrific health, and I intend to continue at McClelland & Stewart for as long as I can," he said, his voice steady and even.

Is he restless? Are there new worlds to conquer?

The questions hardly fazed him. "Something will come along that will interest me," he declared, his self-confidence as bright as the sunlight streaming into his office.

Author explores reasons societies become wealthy

The Wealth and Poverty of Nations,
Why Some Are So Rich and Some So Poor,
By David Landes
(Penguin Canada, $39.99).

Why are some nations rich and others poor? What led Great Britain to set the pace for the Industrial Revolution? Is organized religion a help or a hindrance to economic growth? How did China, years ahead of Europe in technology and exploration, lose its advantage in the 17th century? Why have Latin America, the Middle East and most of Africa lagged behind western nations? Why are some countries able to spark economic growth, and progress in industry and trade while others remain destitute and mired in hopelessness?

These – and a host of similar questions – are at the heart of this massive and formidable study by David Landes, professor emeritus of history and economics at Harvard University.

In reviewing the history of the recent past, the author argues that the major event for change and the key to national wealth was the Industrial Revolution that began in Britain in the 18th century. Some countries were able to stoke this hungry machine for progress, others were not. As a result, some prospered while others remained poor.

But significantly, what made the difference was the attitude of the countries involved toward industrialization. Landes argues – contrary to the views of others economists – that climate, water, rich oil minerals were not the primary factors. Geography, he states, is not destiny. What is of ultimate importance is culture which, in its widest sense, includes curiosity, religious toleration, inventiveness, loose restraints on commerce, a sense of national cohesion and opportunities for women.

Countries that cannot compete in the economic race tend to fall behind because of xenophobia, intolerance, bureaucratic corruption and the stifling of enterprise by restrictive and short sighted edicts. The author writes, "The most successful cures for poverty come from within. Foreign aid can help, but like windfall wealth, can also hurt. It can discourage effort and plant a crippling sense of incapacity…No, what counts is work, thrift, honesty, patience, tenacity. To people haunted by misery and hunger, that may add up to selfish indifference. But at bottom, no empowerment is so effective as self-empowerment."

One salient reason why progress was delayed in the medieval Muslim world was opposition to print-

Rabbinic Reflections

Unlike 'Seinfeld' series Torah story never ends

By RABBI MORDECHAI E. ZEITZ

At any given time there are places to be or places to be seen. For many, the world stood still last week as Seinfeld and company signed off. There were Seinfeld parties and bashes before, during and after. Whether alone or in groups, 60 million people watched. It was unacceptable to watch the tape. You had to witness it.

Stanley Cup or Super Sunday are additional occasions that capture worldwide audiences. You can feel it in the air; there is great suspense and anticipation. Watching the replays or re-enactments just isn't the same.

Three thousand years ago there was another such event. It was called Torah at Sinai – and it was a start up and not a sign off. According to tradition, 600,000 families tuned in.

It was some event. Special effects, a special appearance by God, and a lasting record of the broadcast. It can truly be said that Shavuot, the Revelation on Sinai, was the event that changed society for all times.

The Torah is truly that Divine document that has been not only the basis of Judaism but the basic fabric from which most religions and cultures have been cloned. The original production of Torah on Sinai has had many successful spinoffs, which only indicates that extent of its initial success.

We sometimes fantasize as to what it must have been like to be at Sinai. We lament the fact that we missed this once in a lifetime chance. We will never be able to experience what our ancestors of 3,000 years ago experienced. But the beauty of Torah and the Sinai experience is our ability to recreate the original revelation every time we perform a mitzvah or follow a precept of Jewish law. When we recite the blessing, "Blessed art Thou who has commanded us," it is the same voice of God speaking to us or directing our actions. When we read, study or practice Torah, we are on Sinai. Unlike replays of great happenings, the Torah story never ends; revelation is every day as I endeavor to breath life into inanimate words. That is the true essence of Sinai.

But in the rush of all the words and deeds, we sometimes overlook the most profound phenomena of Sinai. In a world filled with factional and denominational turf wars, we forget the greatest feature of Sinai which took place even before revelation. We allude to it at the seder but after a little wine, we just merely sing along oblivious to the profound thought contained in this most popular song.

We sing: "If God had only brought us to Sinai and not given us the Torah, Dayainu."

How strange? What is Sinai without the Torah? We certainly are not celebrating going to Mount Sinai for a picnic. Sinai is obviously important only because of the Torah.

The amazing answer is, that Torah was a bonus and only made possible by the previous step. "Vayichan Yisroel Neged Hahar: the people of Israel camped adjacent to the mountain." In Hebrew Vayichan is in the singular although their arrival vayavou is pronounced in the plural. So obvious, so simple, so fundamental that we prefer to overlook it.

The basic condition leading to revelation was that all the Jewish people camped together as one. More frum or less frum; this synagogue or no synagogue, every one was glatt a Yid, and each had a place at Sinai. It produced a sense of unity and mutual respect that paved the path leading to the revelation at Sinai.

How ironic that each of us sounds the shofar of our local denomination, claiming exclusive rights for the rebroadcasting of Torah on Sinai. On Shavuot, as on every day of every year, we have the ability with our actions and our attitudes to recreate Sinai with not only serious study and practise but most important with a sense of unity, respecting all Jews who strive to ascend Sinai.

Without this unity of erev Shavuot there can be no Shavuot. On this erev Shavuot I wonder, with a heavy heart, if we could make it to Sinai? With everyone claiming Torah, do we possess the prerequisite for Kabbalat Torah on Sinai? Perhaps this year the emphasis should be on erev Shavuot so that there may be a true Shavuot.

Jewish Life

The original top 10 list

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This Sunday morning, the Ten Commandments will be read from the Torah to mark the first day of Shavuot.

According to Virtual Jerusalem, "When the Ten Commandments were given at Mount Sinai, the course of human history was changed forever. No document has influenced the course of civilization like the Bible, and it can be argued that of all the contents of the Bible, these ten laws have been the single most influential section." [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/shavuot/ten. htm].

You can also listen to a preview of them at Navigating the Bible [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/exodus/torah/ 19252001.htm].

Some people can be forgiven for being a bit groggy while listening to the Commandments,because they've have just stayed awake the entire night for Tikkun Leil Shavuot [http://www.chabad.org/eli/tikkun.html]. According to the Ohr Somayach All-Nighter page, one of the reasons we stay up all night is to commemorate a mistake committed centuries ago [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/shavuos/index.htm].

"On that first Shavuot morning, there were some who overslept and had to be awakened to receive the Torah. In order to rectify this, we stay up."

Another interesting Shavuot tradition is decorating the synagogue with plants and flowers to remember how the barren desert exploded with blooming flowers when the Torah was given on Mount Sinai [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/shavuot/decorate.htm].

Eliezer Segal suggests the basis for the greening of Shavuot is obscure and that even Torah giants like the Ga'on of Vilna were uncomfortable with the custom and called for it to be abolished [http://www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Calendar_Index.html#Shav].

The site set up by Beth El Temple Centre of Belmont, Mass., suggests that the holiday has lost its agricultural significance and that it has been reinvested with new symbols [http://www.shamash.org/reform/uahc/congs/ma/ma002/shavuot.html]. In the mid 19th century, "the Reform movement added its own enhancement to Shavuot, the Confirmation ceremony." This ceremony is meant to parallel the acceptance of the Torah at Mount Sinai with the confirmation that these young Jews are taking the Torah to their hearts.

On Shavuot, the Book of Ruth is read. For several of the reasons we honor the memory of the Moabite convert to Judaism on this holiday, see [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/shavuot/ruth.htm]. If you have installed Hebrew fonts on your Internet browser, you can read Ruth in the original Hebrew at [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/bible/mrut-.html]. The King James English translation of Ruth can be found at [http://www.greateropendoor.org/bible/08_ruth.html]. Or you can have the entire book sung to you [http://www.613.org/rut-ra28.ram]. And for much more Shavuot audio, listen in at 613.org [http://www.613.org/shavuot.html].

The Ten Commandments have even woven themselves into our popular culture. The folks at the Jewish Communications Network have scoured the Internet for dozens of customized "Ten Commandments" [http:// www.cjcn18.com/holiday/shavuot/index.htm]. I leave you with a sampling – some sublime, some ridiculous:

Ten Commandments of the World Wide Web: "Thou shalt not offer any link, unless thou tellest also why that link is worthy of the reader's traversing."

Ten Commandments for Sane Living: "Strike a balance between work and play…Nobody ever said on their death bed, 'I wish I had spent more time in the office.'"

Have a very happy holiday.

Culture of curiosity key to wealth

ing, which had become widespread in the 16th century. The Muslim countries remained opposed, largely on religious grounds. The idea of a printed Koran was unacceptable. Jews and Christians had presses in Istanbul, but not Muslims. It is true that the Christian Church had tried to forbid the dissemination of unauthorized religious texts. But "the demons of heresy were out long before Luther, and printing made it impossible to get them back in the box."

The response of the Catholic Church to the Protestant Reformation, which brought new ideas, skepticism, growing literacy and scientific endeavor, was closure and censure. This reaction sealed the fate of southern Europe for the next 300 years. "Such retreat was neither predestined nor required by doctrine. But this path once taken, the Church, repository and guardian of truth, found it hard to admit error and change course. How hard? One hears nowadays that Rome has finally, almost rehabilitated Galileo after almost 400 years. That's how hard."

For Landes, the best clue to a nation's growth and development is the status and role of women. This is the greatest handicap of Muslim Middle Eastern societies today, the flaw that most bars them from modernity. "If we view gender relations as a continuum running from nothing to full equality, the Muslim countries, and especially the Arab Muslim countries, would bottom out the scale."

'Therefore choose life'

In addition, says the author, the huge Arab oil profits have been a monumental misfortune because "it has intoxicated rulers, henchmen, and purveyors, who have slept on piles of money, wasted on largely worthless projects, and managed to exceed their figuratively (but not literally) limitless resources. Even Saudi Arabia cannot balance its books. In the process, these spoilers have infuriated the Muslim poor who in turn have sought an outlet for rage and outrage in fundamentalist doctrine."

In this astonishingly wide ranging book, replete with intriguing detail and sprinkled with wit and humor, the author discusses, among many other topics, post-World War II alignments that led to the Cold War, the fall of the Berlin Wall, the breakup of the Soviet Union, the rise of Japan as an economic giant and the nature of "tiger economics" in Asia and the Pacific Rim.

At the book's end, Landes stresses the need to accentuate the positive "In this world the optimists have it, not because they are always right, but because they are positive. Even when wrong, they are positive, and that is the way of achievement, correction, improvement, and success." Above all he suggests that we must cultivate a skeptical faith, avoid dogma, listen and watch well, try to clarify and define ends, the better to choose means." And he warns us with these portentous words from Deuteronomy "I have set before thee life and death, the blessing and curse; therefore choose life."

Pesach in the Soviet Union an unforgettable experience

Diplomatically Speaking

By JEHUDI KINAR

With all the events and activities related to the 50th anniversary of Israel, it is possible to lose sight of earlier, equally important personal anniversaries. During Pesach this year, I was reminded of the fact that 30 years ago I had visited the Soviet Union.

Until the Six Day War there had been an Israeli Embassy in Moscow, but after the war there was a rupture between the Soviet Union and Israel, and the embassy closed. Nevertheless, Israel always tried to maintain contact with the Jewish community in the Soviet Union; to see how they were doing, keep them up-to-date on what was happening in Israel and make sure that they were supplied with religious articles. In 1968, when I was a university student in Geneva, Switzerland, I was recruited to visit Jewish communities in the Soviet Union.

Shortly before Pesach that year, I was approached by a member of an organization called BAR, which sent Israelis to the Soviet Union to help bring Jews to Israel. I was at that time chair of the Swiss Jewish student organization and had been active in the campaign for Soviet Jewry. I agreed to go to the U.S.S.R., although I had promised my parents that I would go with them to Israel for Pesach, and it meant that I had to tell them, without really telling them why, that I was going to the Soviet Union instead.

I went to the Soviet Union along with a friend, both of us having received new (Dutch) passports without any Israeli stamps in them. There were many such "teams," each headed for different cities. My friend and I went to Moscow, Vilnius and Leningrad. We took enormous quantities of food: tinned meat, Israeli wine, matzah, sausages. When we arrived at the airport in Moscow, they separated the foreigners from the Russians, and I was concerned that they might discover our stash, so I started yelling angrily, to nobody in particular: "What kind of country is this where they treat tourists in such a way?" and sure enough, they let us through without inspecting our bags.

The Chief Rabbi of Israel, Shlomo Goren, had given us permission to use public transportation (if necessary) to go long distances even on Pesach or the Sabbath, because of pikuah nefesh (in religious law, it is permissible to break the law in order to save a life).

We arrived in Moscow just before Pesach so we went to synagogue the next day. At the synagogue, people asked where we were from and invited us to their communal seder. But that evening our would-be hosts told us that the authorities would not allow them to invite us, so we gave them the wine and matzot, but did not attend their seder. Everybody at the synagogue talked to us, in either English or Yiddish. Many slipped us little pieces of paper on which were written their requests for Israeli visas.

The second day at the Moscow synagogue, someone told us: "The Philistines are on top of you," which we understood as a warning that we were being watched. Indeed, we would see our "watchers" sitting in the lobby of our hotel whenever we came or went. We would sometimes take the train in the wrong direction, jump off suddenly and grab the train going the other way just to shake them off.

Later we went to Vilnius, where I was able to visit the grave of the Gaon of Vilna. In the graveyard, we met a man sitting nearby who had no legs. He spoke Yiddish to us, and told us that even if he had to walk to Israel on his knees he would try to get there. A couple of years later, I attended a wedding in Israel. The groom was originally from Vilna, and I saw a relative of the groom arrive at the wedding on crutches – it was the same man. I asked him if he remembered meeting two Dutch boys at the grave of the Gaon of Vilna, and he said he did. I felt a tremendous satisfaction at seeing that he had been able to get to Israel.

Thirty years later, now that so many Jews from the former Soviet Union are living in Israel, I often think of what I witnessed of their lives when the possibility of aliyah was, for most, a distant but cherished dream.

West Bank mayor seeks help from Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Benny Kashriel

TORONTO — The mayor of the West Bank's largest settlement wants Canadian Jews to help shoulder the task of building it.

Benny Kashriel was here earlier this month to whip up interest in Ma'aleh Adumim, which lies in the Judean Desert some 10 kilometres east of Jerusalem.

Established in 1979, Ma'aleh Adumim was granted city status in 1992. Its current population of 23,000 is expected to double within a decade.

Two-thirds of its residents are Sephardi Jews, with about 15 percent from English-speaking countries. Kashriel himself is of Sephardic origin, his parents having been born in Iran.

In an effort to meet its future needs, Kashriel wants to construct a new municipal building, a mall, a centre for the performing arts, an art museum, an amphitheatre, a high school and indoor gymnasium, an outdoor sports field and more day-care facilities. He also hopes to expand its swimming pool and recreational park.

Kashriel's associate, Eddie Ben-Tzur, director of the Ma'aleh Adumim Foundation, estimated that these projects will cost $20 million.

The Israeli government and the municipality of Jerusalem are supposed to provide much of the funding, said Ben-Tzur, whose wife, Ruth, heads Air Canada's Israel division. Jews in the Diaspora will be called upon to donate two to three million dollars.

Donations will be channeled through a newly-formed organization, Friends of Ma'aleh Adumim.

As part of his mission here, Kashriel, 48, spoke to several Canadian businesspeople in a bid to interest them in investing in Ma'aleh Adumim's existing industrial park. The site already has some 100 factories, producing hi-tech products and such goods as aluminum, chemicals, food, wine and marble.

The settlement, he added, has vast land reserves for additional industrial development.

During his brief visit here, his only Canadian stopover, Kashriel expressed fear that the Israeli government may cede part of the Judean Desert to the Palestinians and thus isolate Ma'aleh Adumim and play havoc with its plans to expand its residential neighborhoods on approximately 3,000 hectares of unused land.

Kashriel, a leader of the settlers' movement in the West Bank, is working with the Land of Israel Front to ensure that this does not happen. The Land of Israel Front, headed by far-right Knesset member Michael Kleiner, opposes any further withdrawals from Judea and Samaria.

In his view, Israel should not relinquish territory to the Palestinians during the five-year interim period ending next May. Instead, Israel should postpone such withdrawals until the advent of final status negotiations, which are two years behind schedule .

Kashriel, therefore, believes Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu should resist American pressure to redeploy from 13 percent of the West Bank over a three month period.

Philosophically, Kashriel subscribes to the Third Way's position with respect to the disposition of the West Bank.

If the Palestinians uphold their end of the Oslo agreement, Israel should ultimately withdraw from 50 to 60 percent of the West Bank, leaving the rest to the Palestine Authority, he said.

Under this scenario, Kashriel explained, all of the settlements beyond the Green Line, including Ma'aleh Adumim, would remain in Israel's hands, though some smaller ones would unavoidably be isolated.

In closing, Kashriel acknowledged that segments of Ma'aleh Adumim's land reserves belong to Arabs, but that no construction has taken place there.

Winnipeg hosts Plenary

among the issues currently preoccupying Congress staff. On the positive side, he noted, there has been dramatic progress in prosecuting Nazi war criminals living in Canada.

He reported that Congress has plans to greatly enhance its Ottawa office and is discussing relocating the Quebec office to the new Montreal Jewish Community Campus.

The latter was the only item of controversy among those attending the meeting. Historian Abe Arnold, a Winnipeg delegate, noted that Congress has virtually no profile here because it is merged with the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council. Montreal delegate Bernard Finestone expressed concern that a similar merging in Montreal may also result in a decline in visibility of Congress in the community.

Over lunch, Hedy Fry, secretary of state, Multiculturalism and the Status of Women) spoke of Canada's success in melding together "in a stir fry" disparate peoples, cultures and religions to form a Canadian identity that also recognizes the distinctive cultures and traditions we all bring with us.

The highlight of the luncheon was the presentation of the Nahum Goldmann Medal to Sol Kanee. In a reprise of a speech he made when Winnipeg's Jewish nursing home was renamed in honor of the Kanee family last fall, Rabbi Israel Singer, executive director of the World Jewish Congress, praised Kanee.

"Sol Kanee has been the man behind the scenes in every major event in Jewish history since World War II, from the creation of the State of Israel to the mass exodus of Soviet Jewry," Singer said. "He has been a fixer par excellence, a man who has changed the world."

Kanee served as president of the CJC from 1971 to 1974 and was the longest serving member of the board of governors of the Bank of Canada.

Versatile Burstyn presents one-man 'party' for Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Mike Burstyn

TORONTO — Consider it another birthday gift to Israel. Or more accurately, a birthday party, courtesy of one of the world's most beloved and versatile performers.

Mike Burstyn – singer, dancer, actor, spinner of yarns and, for good measure, circus performer – is coming to Toronto to stage Hatikvah, the Hope, a theatrical, musical and multi-media retrospective celebrating Israel's 50th birthday.

Burstyn's June 4 show at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts will go towards a park for the disabled, a project of Disabled Veterans of Israel (Canada) Beit Halochem.

The one-man show "is my way of saying happy birthday to Israel," Burstyn told The CJN in a telephone interview from his New York home. "I do that with songs of the last 50 years, anecdotes and jokes about politics, and dramatizations of the people who helped create the state."

Burstyn, now 52, has done just about everything, and done it well. Born in New York and fluent in eight languages, Burstyn has had success on stage, screen and television ever since he first strolled out into the limelight at age seven in Buenos Aires and stole the show from his parents, Pesach'ke Burstein and Lillian Lux, both stars of the Yiddish theatre.

Before settling in Israel in 1954, the family toured the globe, with Burstyn and his twin sister the main attractions. They left Israel two years later, but returned for good in 1962.

Burstyn encountered almost instant fame, winning the first of two Israeli "Oscars" for his portrayal of the twin title roles in the musical film The Two Kuni Lemls. He never looked back.

For a while, he starred in his own TV show in the Netherlands and Israel; he has 25 albums to his credit, has won four Israeli Song Contest first prizes, and has had roles in five of Israel's most popular films.

He's perhaps best known here for his starring role on Broadway in the Tony-award winning musical Barnum, which he reprised for a Dutch version that toured Holland and Belgium.

He's also known as the Israeli Bob Hope, having entertained troops through three wars.

Burstyn's show deftly navigates around politics, but personally, the artist doesn't shy away from Israel's foibles.

"It's one big family feud. There are two people living in Israel today, the secular and the Orthodox. To me, that's a bigger danger than the Arabs. Once we make peace, we will have to figure out how to live together."

But the show "is about entertainment," he said. "It's a positive outlook." A highlight, he noted, is his characterization of Srulik, the popular editorial cartoon figure and symbol of Israel since the state's creation.

The $700,000 Beit Halochem fundraising campaign will go toward the first stage of Halochem Park to be located in Northern Israel, close to Kibbutz Kfar Menachem on the border between the coastal plain and the Jerusalem mountains.

Designed specifically for disabled veterans and their families, the park will also include facilities for disabled children and their families and will be open to the general public. The park will be made accessible to those with various disabilities.

According to Ralph Snow, national president of Beit Halochem, 47,000 disabled war veterans are served by the organization's rehabilitation centres.

"Since 1978, Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel (Canada) has contributed millions of dollars to their support," Snow said.

Each year, Canadians host a group of disabled veterans for a holiday. The 10 visiting disabled veterans in Toronto, this year cosponsored by the Beth Tzedec Synagogue, will be honored guests at the Mike Burstyn performance, Snow said.

For tickets to the fundraising performance, call 787-8950 or TicketMaster 872-5555.

Schwartz/Reisman Make $6M Gift to Community

One of the largest gifts ever received by UJA Federation has been donated by Gerry Schwartz and Heather Reisman. The couple, well-known in Toronto's business and philanthropic circles, contributed an unprecedented $6 million to UJA Federation's Legacy Campaign.

"It's simply outstanding," says Ted Sokolsky, Vice-President of Fundraising for UJA Federation. "This is one of the most meaningful and exciting gifts the community has ever received." Legacy contributions will be used to meet the emerging needs of Toronto's Jewish community as our population of 175,000 continues to grow.

Since the 1980s, Schwartz, a Canadian entrepreneur, has been demonstrating his ability to spot and capitalize on new business opportunities. He is the founder and chief executive of Onex Corporation, Canada's 14th largest company. Now, thanks to this Legacy contribution, the quality of the Toronto Jewish community in the future is also that much enhanced, according to past UJA Federation Chairman David Goldstein.

Gerry Schwartz Heather Reisman

"This high profile gift causes other people in comparable economic situations to sit up and take notice," remarks Goldstein. He, along with other well-respected community leaders, is seeking to raise $150 million worth of Legacy endowments and capital funds over the next three years. More than $60 million has already been raised.

"The gift was a great opportunity for Gerry to maximize his charitable allocation to UJA Federation and help secure the community's future," adds Goldstein, referring to the new tax incentives now applicable to charitable donations through stocks.

"The Schwartz/Reisman contribution not only gave a tremendous boost to the Legacy campaign in terms of dollars," notes Legacy Chair Barry Sherman, "it also went a long way toward building the campaign's momentum. We're enormously grateful for their example and belief in community."

"Heather and Gerry have always been great supporters of the community," adds Brent Belzberg, who is co-chairing UJA Federation's 1999 campaign with Larry Tanenbaum. "I am confident their leadership will have a multiplying effect on other potential donors."

Market Maximizes Donations

A healthy economy, a booming stock market and new tax incentives governing charitable stock donations are combining to make UJA Federation's Legacy Campaign a magnet for Jewish philanthropists.

In less than a year, over $60 million has already been raised toward the $150 million Legacy endowment and capital campaign established to secure long-term funding for the community's development. And many observers, such as Legacy Chairman Barry Sherman, are crediting both a vigorous stock market and significant tax breaks from Ottawa for creating an unprecedented climate for charitable giving.

To date, Legacy has received $30 million in donated stocks ranging from $6 million to $10 million — the most recent coming from Gerry Schwartz, CEO of Onex Corporation and his wife Heather Reisman, President and CEO of Indigo Books & Music Inc.

New incentives introduced in last February's Federal budget have cut in half the 75% capital gains tax levied on the disposition of stocks for charitable donations. These incentives, added to other tax breaks on all charitable contributions, have made it more advantageous than ever for people realizing gains from stock appreciation to assist charities, such as UJA Federation, and enjoy tax savings at the same time.

"Legacy endowments are a great way for people to maximize their charitable allocations and shelter the value of their gift for years to come," explains Sherman. "These endowed funds, critically important to the future of our community, will minimize our annual struggle to retain gifts after some of our most significant donors are no longer with us."

"We are offering our donors opportunities to maximize and perpetuate their gifts to UJA Federation at a time when the conditions are ideal to do so," explains Morris Zbar, Vice President of Planning and Development. "We must encourage those families who have the means to make significant gifts to do so before the climate changes."

MARCH LIVES ON IN THEIR HEARTS

By Adi Neuberger

When a group of 155 Jewish high school students from the Greater Toronto Area, sponsored by UJA Federation, embarked on the 10th March of the Living to Poland and Israel, they knew what they were going to see, hear and feel would be deeply emotional and highly disturbing. The subject of the Holocaust always is. What most didn't realize, however, was how much the two-week journey into their Jewish past and present would profoundly affect their lives.

"It was the most incredible experience of my life," explains Amy Newman, a grade 11 Northern Secondary School student. "The connections I made to Judaism and the relationships I have developed have literally changed my life."

The tour climaxed in Poland, on Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day), when Toronto participants walked hand in hand with 7,000 of their peers, chaperones and survivors from 30 different countries on a 3 km march from Birkenau concentration camp to Auschwitz. While in Poland, the group also visited towns and villages to view remnants of once thriving Jewish life, memorials to Holocaust victims, concentration camps and a Jewish day school.

At the school, MOL participants greeted students as they left for the day and spontaneously began singing and dancing with the children. "It was unbelievable," recalls grade 11 Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto student Samantha Spencer. "We could tell that by being there and singing Hebrew songs with the kids, we made a very big difference to them," adds Spencer. "It gave all of us so much hope."

The March of the Living was also more than a lesson in Jewish history for Adam Banack. According to the grade 10 Forest Hill Collegiate student, it was the continuation of a journey of discovery that began before his bar mitzvah when Banack decided he wanted the occasion to be about more than himself.

Two years ago Adam and his family dedicated his bar mitzvah to the memory of child Holocaust victim Shmuel Eisen, the brother of survivor Max Eisen, one of 25 March of the Living chaperones. While visiting Auschwitz, Eisen, whose granddaughter Amy also participated in the March, showed Adam where his baby brother Shmuel had perished.

"I was captivated by Max the first time he told his story," explains Banack. "But until we got to Poland and I saw the Holocaust through his eyes, I never realized how brave and strong he really is," he adds. "I will remember this trip for the rest of my life because I was able to walk out of Auschwitz for all those who did not."

In Israel, participants celebrated Israel's 50th anniversary at historic Latrun with 5,000 other marchers. They also visited the grave of Yitzhak Rabin, spent Shabbat by the kotel and toured other Jewish historical sites across the country.

"Words cannot express the profound impact March of the Living has on all the participants," says mission Chair Barbara Bank. "The fact that we had to add an extra bus this year testifies to the growing interest among our young community members and their commitment to maintaining their Jewish identity and respect for their past."

"The way the kids absorbed and continue to articulate their experiences throughout the trip signifies that we have little to worry about if these are to be our future leaders," notes UJA Federation Campaign Vice-Chair Abe Glowinsky, whose 16-year-old son also participated on the March. "I left with one child and came home with 155."

STAYING IN CYBER-TOUCH

Many participants on the 1998 March of the Living felt less homesick during their two-week mission thanks to UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto web site (www.feduja.org). Their parents slept a little easier too knowing their kids were just an e-mail away.

Over 700 messages were sent back and forth via Jewish Toronto between MOL participants and loved ones back home. Everything from reminders to wear sunscreen to heartfelt summaries of the day's events to photos were transmitted daily. Visitors logged on the March of the Living page over 8,000 times during the trip.

"The kids loved knowing their families and friends could experience parts of the trip through them over the internet," notes March of the Living Chair Barbara Bank. "It also helped bridge the distance."

UJA FEDERATION BRINGING DIPLOMAT TO TORONTO

Former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Dr. Jeane Kirkpatrick will be in Toronto next month to address UJA Federation's Past Campaign Chairs.

The scholar, diplomat and syndicated columnist will share her years of experience in international politics at a tribute evening honouring former campaign leaders on June 29 at the CBC Building, Glenn Gould Studio, 250 Front Street West.

Kirkpatrick, who also served as a member of the U.S. Cabinet and National Security Council, has authored seven books. The most recent is The Withering Away of the Totalitarian State, which describes the collapse of Communism and the end of the Cold War.

The dinner is being held by UJA Federation to salute communal leaders for five decades of outstanding service and dedication. "We have a lot to be proud of in our community," notes Gil Palter, who is chairing the event with Rhonda Sheff. "It's time to thank many of those who played key roles in making Toronto one of the greatest Jewish communities in the world."

600 non-Jewish kids attend 3rd annual Holocaust seminar

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER

Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Children in Canada's multicultural society have an extraordinary opportunity to learn from each other and must respect one another because "each human being is a star," said Holocaust educator Inge Auerbacher.

"You are the garden of many different flowers," Auerbacher told a large gathering of Toronto-area elementary school students last week. "Make it a better world," the concentration camp survivor urged a group of over 600 non-Jewish students from grades 5 through 8 participating in the third annual Junior/Intermediate Students Seminar on the Holocaust, held at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE).

The children listened intently as the native of Kippenheim – a small town in southern Germany near the French border – told them German Jews who "were very good citizens," loved their country and had "lived in their communities for hundreds of years," were shocked when Hitler came to power in 1933.

She warned students to remain vigilant and resist racist stereotyping, lest history be repeated.

A retired chemist and author of four books of poetry and prose, including two – I Am a Star and Beyond the Yellow Star to America – about the Holocaust, Auerbacher showed slides from inmate artists and spoke of her experiences from age seven to 10 in the Terezin concentration camp in Czechoslovakia between 1942 and 1945.

The title of her 1987 book I Am a Star is meant to turn "something negative into a positive" and show that "every human being is special and has a right to be happy," she said.

The seminar was organized and sponsored by UJA/Federation's Holocaust and Education Memorial Centre, which supplied participating teachers with copies of the book beforehand. Many had integrated it into justice and equity modules in their classes.

'Those children were just like you'

In a talk meant to evoke the Holocaust from a child's perspective, Auerbacher noted that about 1.5 million children were among the six million Jews who died.

"Those children were just like you... The only difference is that they were Jewish," Auerbacher told the students from 15 different GTA public, Catholic and private schools.

"Had Hitler succeeded, he wouldn't have stopped with the Jews," she said. "Maybe he would have targeted blacks, or maybe Orientals."

Surveying the crowd, she suggested many of the children might not be alive today if Hitler had won the war and overrun some of the countries their parents and grandparents may have come from.

She showed slides of herself with other children from her local Jewish school, of whom she was the only survivor.

Students also saw slides of Auerbacher with her favorite doll Marlene, named for the German and Hollywood film star Marlene Dietrich. A gift from Auerbacher's grandmother, "she would be the only object that would survive those horrible years," she said.

She recently donated the doll to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

Abul Ashraf Mohammad, an 11-year-old Grade 6 student at Parkdale's Queen Victoria Public School where he read Auerbacher's book I Am a Star in class, said the talk was exciting. "We should learn more about [the Holocaust]," he added.

Her talk made him realize how lucky he is to be living in Canada, he said.

In addition to Auerbacher's hour-long presentation, students broke off into 20 smaller groups for question and answer seminars with other survivors.

In one group, Mohammad and classmates from Queen Victoria heard recollections from 75-year-old Berlin native Robert Engel, a member of the Dutch resistance and a survivor of the Westerbork concentration camp.

"I really believe the Holocaust can happen again," Engel told students. "It could happen to any identifiable minority. You are the only ones in the world who can stop this nonsense."

His granddaughter Tamara Stieber was there to hear Engel answer students' questions. She is part of the centre's Continued Voices pilot program for young people. Survivors' stories are videotaped to be shown after their death by witnesses like Stieber who will try to answer questions in the way survivors might have.

On June 12, as part of another pilot program by arts educator Helen Fine, students at Queen Victoria will perform excerpts from Terezin's opera, Brundibar, composed by Terezin inmate and Auschwitz victim Hans Krasa.

A similar program for high school students running for the last 18 years attracts between 800 and 1,200 students annually, organizers said.

Chief organizer Stephen Bloom of the centre's executive committee told students the survivors are "heroes who are members of a vanishing breed.

"It's vital that you hear their first-hand accounts of genocide – they were there," he said. "Your are their living witnesses, you are their testament."

Bloom told The CJN this year's program, which saw students and teachers sitting in the aisles, was oversubscribed due to unanticipated demand from local teachers.

Judaica centre opens in Richmond Hill

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

RICHMOND HILL — The Jewish community here now has its own Judaica centre.

Lillian Benlolo, director of Beth Israel Hebrew Academy, a supplementary Hebrew school, said she opened the centre "because we needed a place where people could drop in, get information on the Jewish community, and read Jewish books and newspapers.

The 1,000-square-foot centre on Edward Street contains a gift shop, which carries a wide range of Judaica items, a lounge, a resource centre and a library.

Benlolo is planning Hebrew language classes for adults, and summer tutoring for children who need extra help. As well, the centre will feature lectures throughout the year on various topics.

Typically, people in Richmond Hill feel isolated from the rest of the Jewish community because they do not live in the hub of activity, said Benlolo.

"I feel confident that the centre will become quite popular. There is no obligation to join. People can just come in, meet some friends and feel comfortable."

Rabbi Wolf Gordon, 86, respected scholar, teacher

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Wolf Gordon, a well respected scholar and teacher and a stalwart of Associated Hebrew Schools, died recently of cancer. He was 86.

Rabbi Gordon was principal of the evening school of Associated until it was consolidated into the day school. He then became a teacher, until his retirement in 1981.

After his retirement, he led many shiurim, and did a great deal of chesed work. He was especially faithful to the Mir Yeshiva, which he felt had saved his life, and helped it as much as he could.

Rabbi Gordon was born in Ivanitz, Poland. When the war broke out, along with the other students of the Mir Yeshiva, he escaped first to Japan, and then went to Shanghai, where the institution operated until the coming of peace.

In 1948, he went to New York, where he met and married his wife, Gitel. The couple moved to Toronto the same year.

Son Josh described him as a giving and sweet man, "a giant in good deeds. He could identify with peoples' sorrow, and could rejoice with their joys."

Former students were seen to greet him with great affection many years after they had finished school.

Josh Gordon told The CJN that last summer, Rabbi Gordon had spent a good part of the time studying Talmud with two of his grandchildren. When the grandchildren thanked him for studying with them, he replied "don't thank me — I have to thank you."

"He always saw the bright side — he was optimistic and positive about life."

Rabbi Gordon lost his father and two sisters in the Holocaust. He brought his surviving sister and her family to Canada from Russia in 1961.

Rabbi Gordon is survived by his wife of 49 years, Gitel; son Josh; sister Luba Rolnick; and four grandchildren.

Experts on Indian Jews believe B'nai Menashe are a lost tribe

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — About 3,000 Jews live in the border area between India and Myanmar (Burma), and those in the Indian province of Manipur are in danger of being massacred, according to documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici.

Only 300 have so far been allowed into Israel because they cannot prove they are halachically Jewish, Jacobovici said at a recent executive meeting of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region.

Called the B'nai Menashe, they believe they are descendants of one of the 10 lost tribes of Israel, and as a result of instability in the region, many of them face danger and death from Indian insurgency movements, he said.

In response to his presentation, the 60-member CJC regional executive donated $1,000 out of their own pockets to pay for about half the cost of a plane ticket from India to Israel.

In addition, CJC's outgoing president Goldie Hershon said the CJC will look into the situation and may ask the Jewish Agency and the Israeli government to help rescue the B'nai Menashe.

It appears that the Jewish Agency "mishandled" the situation, said CJC president-elect and Ontario region chair, Moshe Ronen, adding that he has been in touch with the Israeli justice minister about the plight of the B'nai Menashe.

At the meeting, indications that the B'nai Menashe are indeed one of the 10 lost tribes came from three sources: Jacobovici, whose documentary, Quest for the Lost Tribes, is due to be aired on CBC this fall; Shimon Gantge, 24, a B'nai Menashe who is studying for his smichah at Aish HaTorah in Jerusalem and is now in Toronto for three months as a rabbinical intern at Aish HaTorah here; and a report by Toronto photographer Stephen Epstein, who spent Purim '97 with the B'nai Menashe in Manipur.

The B'nai Menashe who go to Israel must go through a year-long conversion process to be formally accepted as halachic Jews, and in that time, they do not receive any benefits, Gantge said.

He and his compatriots in Israel owe a great deal to Rabbi Eliyahu Avichail in Jerusalem, who has helped sponsor them, he said.

In his report confirming the B'nai Menashe's claim that they are Jews, Epstein wrote: "Evidence of their Jewish roots is very strong with customs such as performing circumcision on the eighth day following birth, an obligation of a B'nai Menashe to marry his brother's widow, offering sacrifices on altars and wearing shawls that resemble tallit."

Jacobovici said he first heard about the B'nai Menashe when he met one of their members in an Israeli soldier's uniform at the Kotel in Jerusalem.

He also described a meeting with an "articulate and intelligent" B'nai Menashe woman in India who told him that, because the government was afraid she would not return, she was not allowed a visitor's visa to Israel to see her sister who lives there.

"We know the B'nai Menashe are Jewish because there are so many disagreements among them," the award-winning filmmaker joked.

* * *

Gantge, Jacobovici and Rabbi Avichail also spoke at a fundraiser co-sponsored by the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre and the Canadian Friends of the B'nai Menashe in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary.

At the event, a total of $4,000 was raised to help evacuate the B'nai Menashe.

Gangte said that gaining acceptance in Israel has been a painful experience for him because his skin color is different and because "people are not ready to embrace us as mainstream Jews."

On the other hand, two of his sisters are married to Canadian Jews, he said, and when children in his Manipur community saw videos of the weddings, they were surprised to see "white Jews."

He said his parents, who had considered themselves Christians, had converted to Judaism along with thousands of community members some 30 years ago. However, even when they were children, they were brought up with oral traditions and customs that incorporated vestiges of Judaic traditions.

For example, he said, the community practised ritual circumcision on the eighth day after a male child birth; they sang songs about Passover and the parting of the Red Sea; and around Passover, even though they did not observe that festival, they sacrificed a goat and painted its blood on their doors.

Is it kosher to make money? Issue is debated

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though poverty is evil, wealth is not an unqualified good unless it is used to better the world's lot, speakers at the recent Alan Coatsworth Memorial Lecture agreed.

The lecture at Holy Blossom Temple was titled Is It Kosher/Christian to Make Money? How Judaism and Christianity Approach the Question of Wealth.

One difference, said Jim Marshall secretary for human rights and economic justice for the United Church, is that Christians sometimes feel guilty about their wealth.

Marshall said he felt ambivalent about taking part because he himself felt somewhat guilty.

For 18 years, Marshall said, he tried to depend as little as possible on possessions, living in a small house on the Danforth.

Now, however, "I own two houses, one in the Beaches and one in the Bahamas," he said. "And I'm wearing a jacket I got from Goodwill and a shirt and tie from Harry Rosen."

"The presence of poverty is a moral indictment of the present world; it is morally unacceptable," said Prof. David Novak, dean of Judaic Studies, University of Toronto.

Quoting the Jewish philosopher Maimonides, Novak said, "The purpose of the commandments is not to get wealth for its own sake, but to better allow us to keep the commandments."

In their attitude to wealth, Jews are guided not only by the Bible, but by rabbinical principles following Jewish tradition, he said.

'May the Lord keep you from letting your possessions possess you'

"Poverty can only be eliminated by the proper use of wealth. If the poor are living side by side with the rich, it exasperates them, but does not offer a solution.

"It is a misuse of wealth for a rich person to think he or she is better than others and to keep at a distance," Novak said.

"I don't share the idea that the elimination of wealth will do away with poverty. I'm committed to the capitalist system with proper controls, not to the socialistic experiments which devastated half the world."

Marshall said he deplores the growing gap between rich and poor. "Wealth is not an end in itself. It depends on how it is used and what it does to us. It can harden our hearts."

One way some Christian churches are attacking poverty, he said, is through a task force on corporate responsibility.

The audience of about 100 discussed the presentations and viewed a short video of random street interviews about people's reaction to Jews.

In summing up the evening, Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec Synagogue said, "May the Lord keep you from letting your possessions possess you."

Rev. Karen Hamilton of St. James-Bond United Church was the moderator.

The evening was sponsored by the Young Maccabees, a club for newsboys set up in the 1930s by the late Alan Coatsworth; the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto; the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews; and the interfaith committee of Holy Blossom Temple.

Students complete Hamachon program

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Hamachon, the Toronto Institute for Jewish Leaders, is a new youth program that recently graduated its first group of students.

Ryan Hass, shaliach for Canadian Young Judaea, said the idea behind Hamachon was to give youth representatives from various Jewish organizations ideas on how to run Jewish programs.

"Every month, 15 Jewish leaders from such organizations as Habonim Dror, Young Judaea, B'nai Brith Youth Organization and Hashomer Hatzair came together for three hours and received skills [training] in Jewish programming.

"One session, for example, was on religious pluralism. We brought in three rabbis who debated the issue, and then we gave the students program ideas, which they in turn, brought back to their organizations."

Other sessions included Israeli culture; Jewish festivals; Jewish identity, values and Shabbat; Zionism; the Holocaust; and Jewish history.

Hass was involved in Jewish youth movements when he was growing up in England, and he received a degree in informal education, a course offered in Israel.

In preparation for the institute, he obtained a grant from UJA Federation and then approached youth organizations, which each sent two representatives.

At the graduation, students were given a certificate and a letter to prospective employers, which can be used as a job reference.

Hass said he and his assistants, Michael Soberman, Yehuda Marle and Shula Ofir, have received "a lot of positive feedback. We would like to see it run annually."

Winnipeg consultant takes part in Mideast conference on water

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Terry Lewycky, a Winnipeg-based communications consultant, recently found himself one of the players in the Middle East peace process.

Lewycky, who operates InfoPak Communications with his brother Dennis in Ottawa, was invited to Athens by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) to represent InfoPak as an observer at the International Strategy Development Workshop of the Multilateral Working Group on Water Resources.

"I had recently returned from India and Singapore," he says, "but I couldn't resist being part of the peace process."

CIDA turned to the Lewyckys because of their previous experience in the region. About two years ago, Terry had helped the Egyptian government set up a multimedia water conservation awareness campaign, and Dennis has done some work with the Palestinians.

The workshop participants in Athens consisted of delegates from Israel, the Palestinian Authority, Jordan, Oman, Morocco and Tunisia as well as observers from Japan, Russia, Norway and the United States. The session was led by representatives of the Global Bureau of the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID).

"The objective of the workshop was to develop a regional public awareness program strategy, and plans for a national program in each country," Lewycky says.

He notes that the level of awareness of water conservation varies from country to country in the region. While Morocco is quite advanced, and Israel has produced a CD-Rom to be used in the school system, the Palestinians are still far behind.

The USAID people came with a preconceived agenda – to get agreement on developing a short term regional video, Lewycky reports.

Other delegates rejected USAID agenda

All the other delegates unanimously rejected the USAID agenda of a longer term regional strategy.

Despite the fact no specific program was adopted, Lewycky concludes in his report for CIDA that "there was a general feeling by all in attendance that the workshop had succeeded in achieving its objectives."

The forum, he notes, created an opportunity for open dialogue on the issues of national water conservation awareness strategies and on the the benefits of a regional approach. A framework for the strategy evolved between the delegates without being formally written including a need to continue regional information sharing workshops with a continuity of players and direction and the need to coordinate with and involve other agencies.

Lewycky suggests that Canada can play an effective role – with minimum investment – in providing strategic assistance in specific national water conservation awareness campaigns. He recommends that the priority areas should be Tunisia, Oman, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority with specific programming in the Palestinian areas to encourage community participation and communication skill development. InfoPak has been invited to share its media expertise with the Jordanians, he reports.

All of the participants got along very well, he says. "Because of the nature of the issue – the scarcity of water and the need for conservation – there was a strong sense of the need for a regional strategy that goes beyond political matters," he says. "The three Israeli delegates were extremely astute. They knew what to talk about and what subjects to avoid."

"The next priority is a second workshop," Lewycky says. "This is the only phase of the peace process which is currently still active."

CJC should expand role, says new Pacific region chair

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Zena Simces, the new chair of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Pacific region, says Congress needs to think big.

"Congress needs to go beyond its traditional range of activities," said Simces. "It's a changing world and we need to expand our role in the Jewish community. For example, we should become an advocate on social issues, such as women's issues and health and social services."

Simces, who formally succeeded Dr. Michael Elterman at Congress' recent triennial meeting in Vancouver, said the organization has traditionally concentrated its energies on three objectives: defending the rights and safety of Jews in Canada, representing the Jewish community to government and acting as an advocate for the Jewish community.

Simces told The Canadian Jewish News that during her three-year term, she wants to make some changes in the way Pacific region operates. For example, she plans to strengthen the role played in Congress by other Jewish organizations.

"Congress has a unique structure," she said. "The executive is composed of representatives from every major Jewish organization in the Lower Mainland. In the future, I would like to solicit their opinions more actively and see them become more involved in the executive's decision making."

Simces said Congress also needs to spruce up its communications activities. "CJC has to do a better job educating the community. A case in point is anti-Semitism. We need to tell our people that, although the face of anti-Semitism has been changing, it is definitely not a thing of the past. Just look at the Internet. In my opinion – and I'm speaking for myself here – there needs to be more discussion on how to deal with hate propaganda on the Internet."

Simces said she will encourage more joint initiatives with other cultural groups in British Columbia on issues of common concern, because "there's strength in numbers."

Also near the top of Simces' wish list is more Holocaust education in British Columbia public schools. "We want to see education about the Holocaust become a permanent part of the provincial curriculum."

Simces has been active in Jewish community affairs since her childhood in Winnipeg's North End, where she belonged, she said, to "the usual Jewish youth groups."

Later, after she had moved to Fredericton, N.B., she began to take an interest in the case of Malcolm Ross, a New Brunswick public school teacher who had been suspended for teaching Holocaust denial in the class room.

"I became involved with the Atlantic Jewish Council, a Jewish umbrella organization in the Maritimes. We played an active role educating the Jewish and non-Jewish communities, including the New Brunswick government, about the issues involved in the case." (After a battle in the courts and in the media that went on for several years, Ross was eventually removed from the classroom.)

In 1991, Simces moved to Vancouver. After stints as director of policy and communication for the Office of the British Columbia Public Trustee and as an independent social policy consultant, she became director of marketing and communication for the United Way of the Lower Mainland in September 1997.

Simces said she began to take an interest in Congress activities after she settled in Vancouver. "The Malcolm Ross case first got me interested in anti-Semitism and human rights. When I moved to the Coast, I decided to follow up my interest in those issues, and I became involved in Congress. I'm glad I have the opportunity to make a contribution."

Jokester dentist needed no laughing gas

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Though he denies he told jokes in order to save on laughing gas, retired dentist Dr. Lionel Metrick has gained a reputation as a storyteller and genealogist.

Metrick, a great-grandson of Berel Pullan, a founder of the Ottawa Jewish community, gave a recent talk to the Ottawa Jewish Historical Society about the people who made the capital's Jewish community colorful and influential.

His talk covered the history of the Metrick, Pullan, Sachs, Florence, Maser, Cóplan, Gluck and Edelstein families.

"I work evenings and I'm reasonable," was Metrick's opening gambit when asked to speak to groups. He admits to reworking that famous bit of Jewish folklore: "Are you a dentist or just a doctor?"

He told the audience that his late wife Sarah gave him this advice: "If you can't be loyal, be silent." This, he says, makes discussing his relatives painful

For his bar mizvah, Metrick, now 80, said Elya Pullan sent him a Rolex wrist watch inscribed: "May you always have a good time."

His great aunt, Toba Sachs, an early entrepreneur, bought a trainload of prunes in 1911 and canned them. With the profit, she put her two sons, Max and Tom in the secondary materials (junk) business.

"Toba visited my mother every day and spoke in Yiddish so I would pick up the language. And now I speak Yiddish like a Litvak who has had speech therapy."

Bonds gala celebrates Israel's 50th

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Over 200 people recently attended a gala tribute dinner sponsored by State of Israel Bonds in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary.

This year's honoree was Herb Gray, deputy prime minister of Canada, a well-known supporter of Israel and of Canada-Israel relations.

MC Rabbi Reuven Bulka told the audience that Gray's Hebrew name is Zvi, and that the land of Israel has been referred to as eretz zvi.

He added that Gray "may be by others a deputy. By us he is, and will always be, a premier person."

Barbara Farber, president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'ir, spoke of the respect and affection Gray and his wife Sharon have earned in Ottawa. "Our community of Ottawa has been enhanced by your presence and Sharon's presence."

Speaking of Gray's political life in Windsor and in Ottawa, Shaughnessy Cohen, MP, told the audience that "one of the reasons Windsor is booming is because of Herb Gray...we are pleased to be able to share him with you. Herb is a great symbol of the friendship between our countries, between Canada and Israel."

David Sultan, ambassador of Israel to Canada, spoke warmly of Gray as a friend of Israel. He told the audience that he has met with Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy and they "have agreed, among other things, to announce shortly that we are embarking on a joint project to mark the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel."

One of the highlights of the evening was a tongue-in-cheek video presentation of Gray's life, which mixed humor with serious messages of congratulation from parliamentary colleagues, including Prime Minister Jean Chrétien.

Following the video, Gray spoke with warmth and affection of the welcome he has felt in the Jewish community. "I appreciate the friendship the Ottawa Jewish community has given to me and to my wife and children.

"We look forward, with the support of the Almighty, to many years of celebration – l'dor v'dor – to the generations yet to come."

Norman Lieff, chair, State of Israel Bonds, presented Gray with a book summarizing Israel's 50 years of statehood.

Shalom Village expansion unveiled

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The dedication on Mother's Day of the new addition to Shalom Village was a joyful occasion.

Guest numbered about 150, said administrator Pat Morden. Board members, staff, volunteers, residents, relatives and friends mingled, enjoying refreshments and entertainment by harpist, Elyssa Michalsky.

Residents proudly showed their new apartments to the visitors, who were impressed with the spaciousness, large bathrooms and ample storage space.

The addition, designed by architect Joseph Singer, who also designed the adjoining nursing home, consists of 11 apartments, three in the front of the building, eight at the back, bringing the total to 51.

But there are already 70 names on the waiting list, said former administrator Sheila Burman, who headed the $1.2-million fundraising campaign.

President Carl Loewith welcomed guests, and Allen Gould introduced the guests of honor, major donors Lewis and Ruth Sherman, who cut the ribbon in the lobby of the building named in their honor.

Originally from Boston, the couple, who last fall celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary, settled in Hamilton 45 years ago when Lewis, now retired, became a partner in the Allan Candy Company. They have four sons and one daughter, and nine grandchildren.

Bringing greetings from the government, Hamilton West MPP, Lillian Ross referred to the government's recently announced allocation of $67 million to long-term care and promised continuing support. Alderman Marvin Caplan, on behalf of Mayor Bob Morrow, noted that Shalom Village had received a small grant of $12,000 from the region towards development costs.

"One thing people don't realize," said Caplan, "is that Shalom Village is the example for the greater community," a model for other groups planning similar residences.

The Hamilton community alone raised virtually all of the money, not only meeting the target, but exceeding it, Morden later said.

Singer has also designed a new synagogue for Shalom Village; it will accommodate up to about 100 people and is expected to be ready in time for the High Holy Days.

Another new addition to Shalom Village, Loewith announced, is a van for the use of residents, a gift from Allen and Millie Gould.

Shul holds its last-ever service

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Ohav Zedek Synagogue, the last of Hamilton's five downtown synagogues, held its final services on the second day of Passover.

The building at the corner of Hess and Peter streets, in what was once the heart of Hamilton's Jewish district, will be put up for sale. The Aron Kodesh, some of the pews, the chandeliers and other furnishings will be transferred to the new chapel being built at Shalom Village, where the remaining members plan to carry on.

The late Rabbi Stanley Weber, who served the congregation through the 1970s and early '80s, told The CJN in a 1980 interview, that the story of the Hess Street Shul "is the story of all neighborhoods and their old-fashioned shuls. People move away to the affluent suburbs and the kids who had their bar mitzvahs here wouldn't set foot in this place now."

The congregation was founded in 1907 or 1908 by Russian immigrants. One of its founders, Rabbi Samuel Levine, was the spiritual leader until his death in 1953.

The present building was put up in 1927 but by the 1950s the congregation began to dwindle until a sudden influx of Orthodox Hungarian Jews, who had fled their homeland following the 1956 Soviet invasion, bolstered the membership.

However, as the new members prospered, they too left for the suburbs.

A handful of members kept the congregation going and yeshivah students home for the weekend or holidays would do the leyening. Lubavitcher Rabbi Avraham Roston of Toronto frequently helped out.

A photograph of Ohav Zedek is contained in Historic Synagogues Of The World, by Neil Folberg and Yom Tov Assis (Aperture Foundation of New York).

The reader at the final service was 16-year old Moshe Greenbaum; Cantor David Bercovici, former cantor of Beth Jacob Synagogue, did Mussaf; Prof. Sam Ajzenstat led Shacharit. Chuck Matchen, whose father Harry was president of Ohav Zedek for about 40 years, spoke about the congregation's history.

Theodor Herzl had Sephardi ancestors

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The secret of the extraordinary success of Zionism is perhaps that it remains unfinished, but also that its principal architect was an intellectual as far removed from Judaism as was possible in his time, the Austrian journalist, Theodor Herzl.

An assimilated Jew educated outside of the talmudic tradition, imbued with Germanic culture, an esteemed dramatist of Viennese scenes, Herzl had been sent to Paris as the correspondent for the most prestigious newspaper of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the Neue Freie Press.

The sensational Dreyfus case, which he covered for the paper, affected him deeply. The outpouring of hate that followed the condemnation of Dreyfus unexpectedly awakened Herzl's awareness of his Jewish identity.

A little-known fact about Herzl's genealogical origins is that he was descended from Sephardi ancestors – Marranos who originally came from Spain.

Herzl is the Germanization of the Sephardi name of Loeb, without which one of his ancestors could not have obtained his civil marriage licence.

Theodor Herzl's grandfather, Simon Loeb-Herzl, attended the Sephardi synagogue in Semlin, a small town in the eastern region of what later became Yugoslavia. He prayed alongside Rabbi Yehuda Alkalaï, a noted personality of Sephardi Judaism, who wrote about the establishment of a Jewish state in Judea 50 years before the advent of political Zionism. Few people took seriously the rabbi's eccentric ideas, but Simon Loeb-Herzl believed in them.

In his novel, Altneuland (Old-Newland), Herzl sends a Spanish Jew named Alladino to raise funds in the Jewish communities of the Diaspora to be used to buy land in Palestine. Several Herzl experts have identified the character with Rabbi Alkalaï, whose works Simon often recited when he came to Budapest to rock little Theodor on his knees. Did Herzl get his first inspiration subtly and unconsciously from the Sephardi tradition, despite his being a culturally assimilated Jew?

Theodor Herzl

The principal biographers of Theodor Herzl who make reference to his Sephardi origins include historian Joseph Frenkel in Theodor Herzl, a Biography; Ernst Pawel in his Theodor Herzl and the labyrinth of exile; and André Chouraqui in Un Visionnaire nommé Herzl, la résurrection d'Israël.

At 8 Kornhausgasse St. in Basel, Switzerland, is a unique Jewish museum founded 25 years ago when Swiss archeologists discovered Jewish graves dating back to the 13th century. One entire section uses unedited photographs and authenticated historical documents to record the close historic links that this city, which has a Jewish community of about 2,500, has had for several decades with the leaders of the world Zionist movement.

Another famous photo in this section of the museum is the one where Herzl is leaning against the banister of the balcony of his room in the Hotel Drei Konige, in Basel.

Hip fractures devastating to seniors' health

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hip fractures in the elderly are as devastating to health as the worst case of cancer, a rheumatologist told an overflow meeting on osteoporosis at Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC).

Dr. Jerry Tenenbaum said, however, if young people get enough calcium in their diet and exercise sufficiently, they can avoid fractures later in life.

Two relatively new drugs, said Tenenbaum, Didronel and Fosonex, can help most seniors with osteoporosis and reduce their fractures by 40 to 50 percent. They are life-long treatments and eight out of 10 patients can take them successfully. They are not to be prescribed to pre-menopausal women.

He recommended five milligrams of Fosonex daily as the treatment of choice for osteoporosis in seniors.

In the question period, he said Didronel, which is taken for 14 days in a 90-day cycle, is covered under the government's drug plan but Fosonex is not, and may cost $700 a year.

Tenenbaum, of Mount Sinai Hospital (MSH), spoke at the second of the Health Living series sponsored by MSH, BJC and Jewish Women's Federation. Television host Micki Moore was moderator.

"The advice I want to give you to hand on to your daughters and granddaughters is for them to put bones in the bone bank like they put RRSPs [in the bank]" he said.

Recent studies have shown that 1,000 to 1,500 milligrams of calcium a day can be taken safely, with 400 to 800 units of Vitamin D to help its absorption.

Those with a low level of bone mass are six to eight times more likely to develop fractures. Up to 20 percent of women and 34 percent of men who fracture a hip die in less than one year, Tenenbaum said.

Men are 10 years behind women in developing osteoporosis "but they get it eventually."

Most of the several hundred women present indicated that they have already had a bone density test.

Their questions showed that many are already on the drugs he mentioned and he advised them to take Didronel and calcium separately. Tenenbaum said he recommends a bone density test for patients who have one of several high risk factors in their history.

There are 21,000 fractures annually in Canada related to osteoporosis and they cost health services a lot of money, he said.

Loss of ovarian function after menopause is an important cause of osteoporosis in women, said Tenenbaum.

Nutritionist Fran Berkoff recommended adding vinegar when making chicken soup in order to leach calcium out of the chicken bones without changing the taste of the soup.

To get the equivalent of 300 milligrams of calcium in a cup of milk requires 1½ ounces of cheese, seven sardines, four ounces of canned salmon or four cups of broccoli, she said.

The last in the series is at Leah Posluns Theatre on June 2. The topic is Healthy Mind and Body.

Two-tiered health system said frightening seniors

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A two-tier health system is emerging in Ontario, and that, along with the prospect of privatization of some health services after April 1, 1999, is frightening seniors, says a former New Democratic Party (NDP) cabinet minister.

While some people are getting an income tax cut, others are suffering from the results of "a health care driven by dollars and determined by the bottom line," Elaine Ziemba told a meeting of the Cranbrooke Friendship Club.

Alleging that the Tory government of Mike Harris has bungled the situation through poor planning, Ziemba said delivering health care at home may be just as costly as keeping patients in hospital.

Half of the recently set up 43 Community Care Access Councils have run up deficits in the first six months because patients are being sent home earlier, she said.

Seniors who own their own homes will likely pay a part of the home care costs if their illnesses are not serious enough to merit a doctor's prescription for home care. These would have been covered had they stayed in hospitals. They must also pay for medication at home which would have been free in the hospital.

This is a serious situation, considering that only 34 percent of working people have a private plan that picks up these costs, Ziemba said.

"The NDP is literally the conscience of the country," said David Abramowitz, president of United Jewish People's Order (UJPO), which sponsors the Cranbrooke Friendship Club.

"I think there is a crisis in health care and we are at a turning point," said Ziemba, cabinet minister responsible for senior issues from 1990 to 1995 in the Bob Rae government.

An increase in property taxes and user fees is putting the cost of income tax cuts for the wealthy on the shoulders of lower income seniors.

The government's planning for home care went awry because "they had no sense of how many people were being discharged," she said.

A 45-year-old friend of Ziemba who suffered a heart attack had to wait two days in an emergency area because of a shortage of hospital beds, and his family could not visit him. She learned that some older people were waiting even longer in emergency areas.

The present government's politics have led to hospitals being in an "unstable condition," facing a shortage of nurses and having laid off 8,000 workers in 1996 and 11,500 in 1997.

The government's strategy appears to be that a family member will take over at home to relieve the system of costs, she said, "but that caregiver gets tired, ends up getting ill and maybe loses a job."

She urged members to tell the government they are unhappy with cuts to health services.

Mount Sinai sets funding goals

TORONTO — Mount Sinai Hospital recently announced a major fundraising initiative – the largest in the history of Canadian healthcare – $100 million by the year 2000.

The hospital's the Best Medicine fundraising campaign, more than halfway to its goal already, is headed by Lawrence S. Bloomberg, president and CEO of First Marathon Inc.

The campaign is focused on raising funds for five key areas: enhanced patient care facilities involving construction or renovation ($12 million); state-of-the-art diagnostic and medical equipment ($25 million); information age technology to ensure Mount Sinai Hospital can accommodate the information explosion of patient records, digital imaging and information exchange ($8 million); frontier research – enhancing the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute's reputation as one of the world's most advanced biomedical research centres ($36 million); and support for the institute's mandate to provide vision, leadership and integration of research into medicine ($19 million).

Journey overseas helps enrich students' heritage

The following are excerpts from the personal stories written by six Canadian students at the Rothberg School for Overseas Students at the Hebrew University who travelled to Ukraine last Pesach to participate in the Hillel/JDC Pesach Project in the Former Soviet Union. Their trips were sponsored by the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) and funded by the May and Samuel Rudin Family Foundation.

The students joined more than 500 local Hillel activists who led Passover celebrations in over 200 Jewish communities behind the former iron curtain.

Rena Dascal

As the plane touched down, I felt my stomach turn. I had just arrived in a foreign country to embark upon an unknown journey. What this journey would entail was yet to unfold, but I knew that I would learn, grow, and enrich my Jewish heritage.

After months of physical and emotional preparation, we finally joined our Ukrainian counterparts, local Hillel student activists, for the opening ceremonies at a lodge in Kiev. Our first three days were spent in training and learning about leading our own seders…

I visited many different communities and was able to learn something unique from each one. I was able to understand how fortunate I have been to have the chance to practise Judaism as I choose.

I was also given many insights and was able to grow as a person and as a Jew through constant interaction with three most amazing and inspiring Ukrainian students. I learned about how they grew up both as Jews and as citizens of the FSU.

I now look forward to my own seders back in North America. I will never forget the faces I saw here and I will never forget the joy we brought into their lives…

Maya Haasz

One 95 year-old woman living in Rivne made a particular impact on me. A woman who, by my age, had seen more atrocities in this world than I will ever see in a lifetime. She laughed and danced and warmed the hearts of all those sitting around her. Yet when she sang, the tears rolled down her face as she remembered the eight friends she used to sing with. Though her life was spared, the damage done to her joyous and strong heart was irreversible…

The community leader in Lutsk brought our group to a memorial situated on the grounds of a sugar plant. It was here that the majority of a vibrant Jewish community was shot to death in a ravine. Thousands of victims, and only one survivor to tell the story. How many of these ravines go unmarked because no living trace has been left? How many potential brilliant poets, scientists, engineers and artists lie under the memorial stone?

Our mission, however, went beyond learning about our roots. Throughout our travels we also had the opportunity to teach others about theirs. At a seder in Lutsk, 30 women gathered around me and one by one, they repeated the blessing over the candles, word for word – words which many of them hadn't pronounced for decades, if ever.

The attendance at this seder was extraordinary, with 90 people sitting around long tables. This is not uncommon to a synagogue gathering in Montreal. Only here the number consisted of a majority of the Lutsk Jewish population, a community that once had 30 synagogues of which no trace remains. But the desire to learn more about, and identify with, Judaism and Israel was powerful and touching. One man approached me and eagerly questioned me about Israel. He then proudly assured me that he would be moving there. He wasn't sure when or how, but he would go…

Maya Haasz graduated from Dawson College last year.

Ira Markus

My entire family draws its roots from this region in eastern Europe, although this trip was far-removed from a "coming home" for the holidays. Seeing so many grandparents like my own and being spoken to in Yiddish made whole rooms of new people seem familiar and made me feel less like a missionary than a helpful kid…My eyes were opened to a whole different 20th-century history when I led a seder.

The seder seemed familiar to the participants. I recall more than one gratifying smile as we sang the four questions.

The most fulfilling part of the seder was learning the essence of the holiday from Jewish people who had not celebrated a seder in years. Whether they said so in broken English, Russian or Yiddish, with a smile, a song or a dance, every individual I communicated with had that same look. They were celebrating the Exodus again, the freedom of the Jewish people, with us.

Ilana Reitzes

The songs are still playing in my head, the horahs still rushing around and around like the circle of life, and the voice of Samuel still rings in my ears.

I'll never forget our last seder in the city of Cherkassy. I've never seen a seder so full of excitement and love for Judaism and for the spirit of the Jewish people. For years, the Jewish people of Ukraine were silenced by the horrors of the Holocaust and by the Communist regime. Now, the Jews of Cherkassy (with their brethren across the country) are reclaiming their voice. Their Jewish pride rings loudly through their songs. In fact, in that last seder, Peter, the leader of the community, called a sing-off competition. Each table louder than the other sang with their hearts the songs of their youth, songs of the spirit of the Jewish people. Young and old, singing strongly and proudly together. A few years ago, this could never have been imagined – the Jewish voice of generations coming together.

Memory is an important part of reclaiming the Jewish voice. So many elderly men and women were touched by our prayers and our songs, remembering those same words that came from their parents. One beautiful man, Samuel, did not remember much from his youth, but he did remember the songs. He would take my hand, put it on his shoulder and dance with me to old Yiddish songs…He would sing about Jerusalem and about the Jewish people with such excitement and joy, like none I've ever seen or heard.

He taught me that the Jewish voice within a person can never die out. That despite 70 years of Communism and the Holocaust, an 86-year-old man can still sing and dance to Jerusalem like he did as a child.

The education of youth is the final part of reclaiming the Jewish voice. Seeing the youth of the Cherkassy community help lead the seders, I realized the most amazing thing: I have seen the four sons of the Hagaddah…

In the Ukraine it is now the age of the fourth child. She now has the opportunity to reclaim her identity and return it to her parents and grandparents. This is the fourth generation of rejuvenation, joy and hope. For what could have been a lost people is now a people with a voice. They see themselves as part of a greater story told to them by their children.

Jenya, board members of the Vinnitza Jewish council, lay workers who pour in hours of rebuilding that which they only heard about from their grandparents. Together, they and their board are fighting to develop a framework to bequeath to their children.

I never imagined Tanya, Artyom, Yan and tens of other students learning about Judaism for the first time. They are going to Hillel, working for the Jewish present and future, having fun and making friends – just like me. I never thought about life here, or the addition of new and potentially vibrant Jewish communities to klal Yisrael…

Much of the Jewish community here is starting fresh, built with outside assistance and an internal hunger. The renaissance taking place is faded by the memories of the elderly, the skills of the parents and the energy of the youth. It is also being built upon the foundation of repression and oppression.

I visited homes in Zmerinka that were heated by coal, virtual junk heaps in which ailing elderly inhabitants could only clap and smile while tears ran down their faces as we sang and danced.

In one such house, a disposable menorah with candles set in eight slots stood proudly on the table next to an open package of crackers and medicines. The 86 year-old man dressed in a ragged shirt and rumpled pants breathed through a hole in his throat and wheezed and indecipherable "speciba" – thank you. He remembered all the details of his Jewish childhood and was overjoyed to hear the songs of his youth. He lives alone in his tiny shack and depends on three hot meals a day from Chesed, a Jewish community organization sponsored by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

He is at the top of the community list to receive aid as it becomes available. There are no government social services, no safety nets in Ukraine. Whatever the Jewish community provides is what he gets.

Chesed not only provides food, but also companionship – people. In one day, we visited the homes of eight elderly people, most of whom could not leave their small apartments. When they saw our smiles and heard our songs, their faces lit up and their small lonely worlds expanded. They all clapped and hummed, clutching the box of matzah we brought as a gift. Some cried, reminded of their daily struggle. Then they laughed, cheered by our exuberant and off-key singing, cheered by the flashes of their history that we were singing. Some threw away their years, their cares, their burdens and danced with us. They danced away their isolation and poverty and fear.

They danced away their fear, their isolation

Together, we danced for the future. They all hugged us. They all thanked us. They will be thinking of us for months to come and we will think of them. Such a simple thing to give – some time, some affection. Yet it means so much and makes such a difference.

One such visit changed lives forever – not only the lives of those we visited, but ours as well. An old man answered the door in an apron, while cooking food for his bedridden wife. We sang for them, smiling and dancing.

Then Shalom, one of my travelling partners, asked the man if he wanted to put on tfillin. It would be his first time in 75 years. The man's eyes widened, reddened, then filled with hope. His hands trembled as he casually shrugged his consent not trusting himself enough to talk. His wife looked gently on, waiting to share in another of the many moments upon which their lives together were built. The man held out a shaking arm as Shalom began the ancient ritual that has been passed from generation to generation. But here it was passed from grandson to grandfather.

The man repeated the blessing with a shaky voice, gaining more confidence as the words struck a long-buried chord. As he covered his eyes to recite the Shema, he recalled the same action from his childhood, reawakening a memory that would have been lost to him. As we left, he and his wife thanked us for remembering them. I would like to thank them for simply remembering.

Today we arrived in a small Ukrainian community outside of Kiev, and my noble mission is not so clear… The Jewish communities I visited, Bogoslav, Kanef, Korson, Gordishia and Kegarlic, are rich with education. Sunday schools are available for both children and adults. They have community centres and Jewish cemeteries, and they take great pride in being Jewish. There are Jewish libraries where prayers are conducted, and although there is no synagogue per se, alternate houses of worship are utilized. Services take place in homes, community centres and schools. A Reform rabbi from Kiev visits there as often as possible. There is the option of an Orthodox influence, also based out of Kiev.

Adolescents celebrate bar and bat mitzvahs, people engage in Torah study every Shabbat with parshat hashavuah classes. Holidays are celebrated – everything from Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur to Purim, Shavuot, Simchat Torah and Israel Independence Day.

The communities feed off each other, and because numbers are small, they often congregate together… They have leadership, ritual, prayer and custom. Most of all, they have belief and faith. There is a great deal of learning to be done here. I am not sure I am the only teacher.

Dear Sarah,

I am writing this letter to express my appreciation to you and The Canadian Jewish News, and to tell you just how successful my advertising program in the CJN has been.

When I first started Capital Ideas, my advertising objective was not necessarily to generate new business, but to let the community know the new company's name, describe the products I offer, and to inform them of my new address and phone number.

I intended to accomplish this with a consistent program of relatively small space ads over a period of no more than one year. Two years later, the program has proven to be an overwhelming success.

Many advertising programs work underneath the surface and it is often difficult to quantify the results. In my case, I can directly attribute a substantial number of new clients who said that they found me in The Canadian Jewish News. More importantly, the income I have earned directly from these clients has exceeded my cost of advertising by a significant margin.

In addition, I now enjoy a certain amount of recognition because the ads run with my picture. People often remark that they have seen me before – or that I look just like my picture in The CJN. I believe this also enhances my business and establishes credibility in the eyes of the community.

In short, I am extremely pleased with the results and I intend to continue my Canadian Jewish News advertising program for the foreseeable future.

Thanks again,

Ken Stern

Cabinet considers revised U.S. pullback proposal

By HERB KEINON AND JERUSALEM POST STAFF
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The security cabinet convened late last Sunday night to consider a revised U.S. proposal aimed at breaking the deadlock over the scope of an IDF redeployment in the West Bank.

A senior diplomatic source said the proposal, which was one of several presented during Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's recent visit to Washington, calls for the second pullback to comprise 11 percent of the West Bank and to be implemented within three months.

An additional four percent is to be turned over to the Palestinian Authority (PA) no later than the beginning of the final-status talks, which, according to the Oslo accords, are to commence by next May.

Both redeployments would hinge on what Israel terms "reciprocity" in implementing of the accords under this proposal. The Palestinians would come to the final-status talks controlling 42 percent of the West Bank.

Netanyahu delayed his departure for an official trip to China by six hours to meet for a third time with the security cabinet.

The flurry of activity came as some cabinet ministers complained they are being kept out of the loop on the negotiations over redeployment and as Netanyahu insisted that the peace process is in "dire straits."

With this terminology, the prime minister continued to back down somewhat from comments he made last week, when he said that the peace had "collapsed" two years ago after a wave of suicide bombings.

At a meeting with some 25 U.S. legislators here on a visit to mark the country's jubilee, Netanyahu said: "I said here in the hotel [last week] that the peace process was in dire straits in the first two years of Oslo. I repeat that statement."

Indeed, said Netanyahu, the picture the world has had of a thriving peace process over the years has been misleading.

"We had a peace process that began in Madrid, in rapid phases of deterioration by the end of 1995," Netanyahu told the congressmen.

"With the exception of the Jordanian-Israeli success, it came to a complete standstill with the wave of terror in the spring of 1996," he said.

Netanyahu told the delegation that talks with Lebanon had already "dwindled" by 1993, that the multilateral talks had faltered in late 1995, that the talks with Syria ended in 1996, and that final-status talks with the Palestinians were postponed that year due to the wave of terror.

The delegation leaders included Newt Gingrich, Richard Gephardt and Benjamin Gilman, who spoke of Israel in glowing terms and greeted Netanyahu warmly.

Labor party head Ehud Barak said the timing of Netanyahu's remarks regarding the state of the peace process is not coincidental, but rather an "attempt to create an alibi for his failure by casting the blame on previous governments."

During a discussion on the peace process in the cabinet, Netanyahu said that before the government was established, there was no reality of peace but rather one of repeated acts of terrorism.

"There was a problematic agreement, which was not even honored by the Palestinian side. The cabinet agreed to accept the agreement and remains obligated to continuing the peace process, on condition that the other side fulfils its commitments," he said.

Regarding the extent of the redeployment, the prime minister said that Israel has not reached an agreement with the United States on this matter.

"Israel can carry out the redeployment, on condition that its security interests are not affected," he said.

Upon returning to Gaza from Cairo, PA Chairman Yasser Arafat said the United States had not set a deadline for Israeli agreement to the Clinton administration's bridging proposals for a redeployment.

Arafat also called on Washington to blame Israel for the breakdown of the peace process.

"I didn't fix a date, but I am insisting that the American administration [announce] its initiative and what happened to this initiative," he said.

Third Way seeks unity gov't.

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Third Way said it would try to meet with President Ezer Weizman, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Labor Party leaders in an effort to form a national unity government to rescue the stalled peace process.

Labor chair Ehud Barak, however, said that a unity government is not on his party's agenda.

"This bad government must be replaced," he told reporters in Tel Aviv. "We now have a government that is not thinking about the security of its citizens but of its own survival and the survival of the man at its head."

He called on Netanyahu to cancel his trip to China and to travel instead to Washington to finalize an agreement on the second redeployment.

Third Way leaders, who met to discuss Netanyahu's controversial statements on the state of the peace process, demanded the prime minister resist right-wing pressures and implement the second pullback.

However, party leaders were divided in their response to Netanyahu's statements. While MKs Alex Lubotsky and Yehuda Harel are demanding the party take steps to pressure Netanyahu to implement the second pullback and advance the peace process, Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani argues this is not the time to spark a coalition crisis.

"I admit I'm confused, I don't know where Netanyahu is heading," Lubotsky said. "The government is held in a vise by the radical right wing and I'm not sure it's going in the direction it has declared it will go in its guidelines, to implement the peace process."

Third Way and Labor MKs are said to be discussing a deal in which Labor would give Netanyahu a parliamentary safety net and not support any no-confidence motion brought by the Right to challenge a second pullback.

The Third Way, for its part, would publicly warn Netanyahu that if the redeployment isn't carried out by the end of July, it will quit the coalition and join Labor in an attempt to topple the government.

Kahalani said "we must not create a crisis now or break up the government, as this would only weaken our position in the negotiations with the Palestinians. It would be irresponsible to put a gun to Netanyahu's temple at this stage."

Canadian, Israeli jurists discuss common legal issues

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Canadian and Israeli jurists met at Tel Aviv University earlier this month for a three-day International Canada-Israel Law Conference.

The conference, entitled Litigating The Value Of A Nation, was co-sponsored by the Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Programme, a consortium of Canadian law schools including McGill University, University of Toronto, University of Alberta and Tel Aviv University Law School. The conference was also held in association with InterAmicus – Israel Association for Canadian Studies.

The co-chairs of the conference were Prof. Irwin Cotler of McGill University and Dr. Asher Maoz, head of the Tel Aviv University Institute of Criminal Law.

Its theme reflected the fact that this year sees the historic convergence of the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the State of Israel and the Israel Supreme Court.

In his opening remarks, Cotler pointed out that this year was also the 50th anniversary of the Genocide Convention, "the Magna Carta of human-kind.

"In 1948 the human rights convention and the new state of Israel were to be a light unto the nations. They were at one in 1948. Fifty years later we find ourselves at a critical juncture. A Dickensian moment of 'the best of times and the worst of times.' We see in Israel increasing fissures, an adversarial culture.

"We hear a lot of the Americanization of Israel, where Canada appears as an afterthought. There is in fact a strong connection between the legal cultures of Canada and Israel: a legal and cultural symmetry which inspired the establishment of the Canada Israel Legal Cooperation Programme in 1992.

"The program exchanges views on fundamental freedoms and their limits, gender and minority rights, social and economic rights and the nature and legitimacy of judicial review in evolving constitutional democracy. It is a unique legal cultural connection."

Cotler pointed out the constitutional and legal-historical similarities between the two countries. "Both Canada and Israel are parliamentary democracies. Both have written most of the parliamentary constitution in the absence of an entrenched Bill of Rights. Both are exploring the possibility of judicial review in an evolving constitutional democracy. Both are mixed jurisdictions enjoying a civil and common law heritage. Both eschew in constitutional and cultural terms the absolute separation of church and state and therefore there is a particular relevance for Canada, as Israel evolves the notion of the meaning of Jewish and democratic state.

"Both are concerned with group rights, as well as individual rights. Both are multicultural democracies...grappling with the role and rights of not only linguistic and cultural minorities, but national minorities, the francophile national minority in Canada and the Arab national minority in Israel.

"In Canada and Israel," Cotler went on, "we are not only able to experience the human rights revolution, we can fashion the revolution. The relationship between Canada and Israel in the terms of legal cultures is unique and distinctive. There is no other place where you can find such parallels."

Prof. Aharon Barak, president of the Supreme Court of Israel, said, "We judges of the Supreme Court are faced with the conflict [between] free speech and maintaining public order. Freedom of religion conflicts with freedom from religion. Our legal system obliges us to solve these conflicts. We cannot abstain from giving judgements, but our legal system does not provide us with the needed tools to answer the questions. In many cases, we are told that the solution lies in a balance between conflicting values.

"A supreme court judge cannot do whatever he or she wishes," said Barak. "Absolute discretion for judges as well as any other bureaucrats," he emphasized, "is the beginning of the end of democracy."

Barak's sentiments were echoed separately by Canadian Supreme Court justices Ian Binnie and Frank Iacobucci as well as by Ontario Appellate Justice Rosalie Abella.

Commenting on the importance of the protection of human rights, Abella told the gathering, "It is a magnificent coincidence that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Israel were born in the same year. Both were products of the Holocaust and represent the triumph of hope over history. Both screamed 'never again' in their birth announcements, and both demanded the chance to grow with dignity and respect. They both knew that they were viewed by some with hostile suspicion, and by others with embarrassed resignation. They both knew that the world which endorsed them, feared them."

Abella, in agreement with several speakers, was critical of the poor international record in the advancement of human rights. "The arteries that pump justice into the hearts of our nation," she said, "are growing sclerotic, clogged by a diet rich in intolerance. People see what they are looking for. One person can look into a Venetian canal and see garbage, another can see rainbows. It is what their education and experience can train them to see. A judge is a function of her times."

In addition to the three Canada-Israel legal conferences, the program has been involved in several other initiatives involving legal jurists and scholars from Canada, Israel, the United States and Germany.

The conference in Tel Aviv was attended by jurists, scholars and legal practitioners, including judges from the supreme court of both Israel and Canada; as well as by constitutional law experts from the United States. It explored such diverse themes as equality rights, social and economic rights, and the politicization of the judiciary.

"I've already made some friends and had a lot of fun!"
"WOW! What a beautiful and diverse place!"
"I no longer feel so isolated in a small town."
"You have really changed my life with this."

Palestinian state be founded in our land... This city cannot be shared."

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat called a U.S. congressional delegation, which included House Speaker Newt Gingrich, House Minority Leader Richard Gephardt and Pennsylvania Governor Tom Ridge, a "major provocation."

Gingrich, speaking at a luncheon for the delegation hosted by Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, said, "I want to [respond] to those who complained about our presence and said it was somehow a provocation for us to be here on Jerusalem Day.

"True peace will come when everyone understands that you can be for Jerusalem Day without being against anyone; you can be for living together without being opposed to anyone; and that you can seek security for everybody without threatening anyone."

WASHINGTON, May 14 — The United States government tonight recognized the new Jewish state of Israel as the de facto authority in Palestine. Presidential press secretary Charles Ross announced that the president had approved the following statement at 6:11 p.m.:

"This government has been informed that a Jewish state has been proclaimed in Palestine, and recognition has been requested by the Provisional Government thereof.

"The United States recognizes the Provisional Government as the de facto authority in the new state of Israel."

U.S. changes tactics

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Public pressure has given way to quiet diplomacy as the United States works to revive the moribund Olso peace process

Mideast Analysis

Until recently, Washington had publicly pushed Israel to embrace its plan for a further 13 percent withdrawal from the West Bank in exchange for Palestinian measures to quell terrorism. But of late, the United States has lowered its rhetoric without "watering down" its proposals.

In the face of steadfast resistance from Benjamin Netanyahu, and the support his hardline views have elicited in the U.S. Congress, the Clinton administration has switched tactics in a bid to convince Israel to cooperate.

Instead of trying to browbeat Israel, the United States has adopted a softer tone, jettisoning for now all talk of ultimatums and deadlines.

The current period of strained relations between Washington and Jerusalem began with the abysmal failure of talks in London early in May designed to break the 14-month stalemate in Israel's negotiations with the Palestine Authority. Yasser Arafat accepted the U.S. proposals, but Netanyahu, claiming that a 13 percent redeployment would compromise Israel's security, offered nine to 11 percent.

The tension escalated when the United States gave Israel several days to accept an invitation to attend a summit in Washington to launch final status talks. The invitation, which was conditional on Israel's acceptance of the American plan, was rejected by Netanyahu but accepted by Arafat.

This created the dual impression that the United States and the Palestinians essentially concurred on the basics and that Israel was the recalcitrant party.

Alarmed by this growing perception, Netanyahu agreed to meet U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and her aide, Dennis Ross, for additional discussions. No breakthroughs were achieved, leaving Albright and President Bill Clinton increasingly frustrated and the faltering peace process in a dangerous limbo.

Netanyahu, however, used his time in the United States to make the case that Israel alone had the right to determine its security requirements, and that American "diktats" were counterproductive and would be rebuffed.

Netanyahu was politely received by major Jewish organizations, although a survey indicated that 80 percent of American Jews supported Washington's initiative. He was also given a warm bipartisan reception on Capitol Hill, which created a rift between the executive and legislative branches of government on Mideast policy. Senate Majority leader Trent Lott and House of Representatives Speaker Newt Gingrich – who recently accused the White House of trying to blackmail Israel – espoused Netanyahu's views.

No one was surprised by the anti-Clinton tilt. On May 6, 220 of 435 members of the House of Representatives signed a letter backing Netanyahu. And earlier, on March 26, 81 of 100 senators warned Clinton that the size and scope of further redeployments should be decided by Israel.

Chastened by Netanyahu's public relations successes, the U.S. government backed away from an open confrontation with Israel, reiterating it had no intention of imposing a settlement. On instructions from Albright, the U.S. ambassador to Israel, Edward Walker, noted that policy disagreements would not "affect our fundamental commitment to Israel." Previously, Albright had promised not to issue ultimatums or threats. Hammering home this theme last week, U.S. Vice-President Al Gore pointedly observed: "Our special relationship with Israel is unshakable. It does not depend on the peace process..."

Even so, the United States remains committed to its still-unannounced peace proposals, which Albright has described as "balanced, flexible, practical and reasonable" and in line with Netanyahu's insistence on "reciprocity."

It's a point Clinton recently conveyed to King Hussein of Jordan and President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt, both of whom have immense stakes in a successful outcome of talks between Israel and the Palestine Authority.

Syria said deploying upgraded Scud missiles

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Syria has positioned upgraded Scud missiles to hit key Israeli targets, according to an Israeli military intelligence source.

Syria is targeting Israel's nuclear facility at Dimona, all of Israel's airfields and most of the major cities, the source told the London-based newsletter Foreign Report.

The Scud-C missiles have been modified with the aid of Russian experts to make them far more accurate, and they are now also capable of carrying high-explosive chemical cluster bombs, the source said.

Once the Scuds are launched, it will take just three minutes before they reach their targets and, according to the source, it will be virtually impossible for Israel to stop them.

The intelligence source's assessment contrasts with the Israeli military intelligence agency's annual report. This report, recently presented to the government, insisted that "in Syria the level of preparations for war is low."

Jean-Jacques Bourgeault, senior executive vice-president of Air Canada, who came on the inaugural flight, responded to a speech of welcome from the Canadian ambassador to Israel, David Berger.

"We arrived in Israel three years ago as a partner in economic growth. We arrived today with a new service and a renewed partnership based on economic growth, mutual respect and a lasting friendship that exists between Canada and Israel," Bourgeault said.

With this new twice-weekly direct service from Montreal, Air Canada will fly at least one flight per day to Israel from Canada. The remaining five flights depart from Toronto.

"We intend to build on our present services to Israel," Bourgeault said in an interview afterward. "Now Canadian and Israeli businesspeople can count on our daily service and our Star Alliance connections. [Star Alliance is an affiliation of airline companies around the world, of which Air Canada is a member.]

"We are hoping that down the road, not only will trade and commerce continue to flourish between our two countries, but also that the peace process will permit us to start building on that service and eventually make Tel Aviv the hub of our operations in the Middle East.

"We could start becoming a much bigger player in the Middle East using Tel Aviv as the base."

Argentina blames Iran for bombings

By SERGIO KIERNAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Charges expected to affect diplomacy, trade between two countries

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina is reducing its diplomatic ties to Iran to a bare minimum, charging Tehran with complicity in the deadly bombings of two Jewish sites here.

The charges have created a war of words between the two countries that will likely affect diplomacy and trade.

And it may also finally result in convictions of at least some of those behind the March 17, 1992, bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires and the July 18, 1994, bombing of the city's main Jewish community centre, known as AMIA.

Last week, saying there was an Iranian connection behind the attacks, Argentina recalled all but one of its diplomats from Tehran. It also told the Iranian government to do the same with its diplomats in Buenos Aires. Iran countered by saying it would cut its economic ties with Argentina.

Reactions to the latest developments provoked mixed reactions within Argentina's 300,000-strong Jewish community.

The lawyer for the Jewish umbrella organization DAIA, Luis Dobniewski, said he was optimistic that Argentina would finally confirm that Iranian officials had a hand in the bombings.

Others, however, were not so optimistic. According to Laura Ginsberg, a member of the Memoria Activa group that represents the relatives of the bombings' victims, "Jews ought to be cautious."

"Blaming it all on Iran is very convenient to the [Argentine] government," she said. "President Carlos Menem badly wants to close the case and not investigate the local connection – the local police and officials that took part in it."

"Blaming Iran," she added, will enable the government to avoid the "investigation that really bothers them: the activities of right-wing police squads."

Indeed, the investigation into the AMIA bombing has often targeted members of the Buenos Aires police.

A former police commissioner in charge of the grand auto theft division of the Buenos Aires provincial police was arrested in 1996 along with 10 other police officers on charges that they had sold terrorists the van used in the AMIA attack. They were all subsequently released.

Jewish leaders here and abroad have long cited incompetence, corruption and anti-Semitism among police and government officials as causes of Argentina's inability to solve either bombing.

For their part, Argentinian investigators have long claimed that there was an Iranian connection, and the government has previously downgraded its diplomatic relations with Iran.

Argentina only had a vague basis for its accusations, but now the Foreign Ministry is speaking of "new, conclusive evidence" indicating that Tehran was behind the bombings.

Early in April, the Argentine official in charge of the investigation of the AMIA bombing, Judge Juan Jose Galeano, went to Germany to interrogate a former Iranian official described as "an Iranian dissident."

Galeano never disclosed his findings, but a source close to him said there was "a new sense of excitement" after the interrogation.

According to the source, the judge is gathering information to issue an international arrest warrant against a former Iranian diplomat, Moshen Rabbani.

Expelled from Argentina in December, Rabbani was the cultural affairs secretary in the Iranian Embassy.

Last week, Galeano took a decisive step based on the information he gathered in Germany.

On May 14, he ordered the arrest of Imaiam Koshrow, an Iranian national who has been living in Argentina for several years. The next day, police teams arrested seven other Iranians living in the country.

A source close to the judge said in an interview that all eight Iranians were "connected to the Iranian Embassy here" and worked for the embassy or its cultural centres "on an irregular basis."

At least one of the Iranians was arrested while police raided the premises of the South Beef Eximport Co., where an undisclosed number of passports bearing forged Argentine visas were seized, the source said.

After Argentina recalled its diplomats and carried out the arrests, Tehran announced it would impose economic sanctions against Argentina if "the unfounded harassment of our diplomats and nationals does not cease at once."

Last weekend, the Iranian chargé d'affaires in Buenos Aires, Abdoirajim Sadatifar, insisted that Iran had "nothing to do with the bombings" and blamed Argentina for "giving in to international pressure."

The official Iranian news agency, IRNA, referred to the "interference of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires" in a threat to cut off relations with Argentina.

A newspaper in Tehran quoted the Foreign Ministry's director-general of American affairs, Mohammad Reza Bakhtiari: "It seems that the Argentine judicial system is under the influence of Zionist elements trying to blame their domestic problems on Iran."

Color your nails exotic, bold

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN

Lilac. Storm. Electric blue. Cherries in the Snow. Heart. Raven Red. Sparkling Mint Sorbet. Provocative nail polish, provocatively named. Nail Fetish, one cosmetic company calls its line of alluring nail colors.

Gone are the days when spring meant pale pastels of ivory, delicate pink and barest blush shades. When frosts were wild and daring and only for the young and bold. When summer meant only bright reds and bright pinks – matching fingernails and toes. And autumn and winter were the seasons of rusts and browns and dull reds, always in matte and cream colors.

Today nails and nail polish are in – in a big way. Blues, purples and variations of yellow and gold are today's hottest colors promoted by today's top faces.

Cindy Crawford and Halle Berry pose for Revlon's line of purple and blue nail polish with matching lip colors. How about Two-Timer Stars (blue)? Or New Year's Blues? Bamboo Yellow for a hot summer's day?

Avon has created a line of luminous nail colors with heavenly names: Moon, Venus. Shades of other worlds.

Pacific Palisades has the exquisite Christie Turlington as its spokeswoman. And those shades – Violet Storm and other hotly named nail colors – are anything but calming.

With so many wild wonderful hues to choose from, match the outfit to the nail polish. Bring out the canary-colored jacket to go with the Banana Yellow nail polish by Maybelline. Go Blueberry. Or Apple, a lively green also by Maybelline.

Go boisterous and bright with L'Oreal's Orangeade, an unsubtly orange nail polish. Or glow with Day-Glo, a lime-yellow blend as outrageous as its name. Make it dark with Lights Out (black). Or go earthy with Grassroots (green), Key Lime (green) or Lemon Twist (yellow).

And change quickly. The latest in nail technology allows you to paint your nails and go out right away instead of waiting around for an hour for them to dry. Revlon has Top Speed, gold-capped bottles with shades of Girly (pink), Moss (green), Juicy (melon) and Smoke (grey). Maybelline goes Express with its line of quick-drying polishes.

Go to the other extreme. White and pale polishes have not been this big since the 1960s and Mary Quant. Remember white lipstick and long white nails? Well, the lip color still has a way to go before women use it en masse, but French White by Cutex has arrived, as have Clear Ice and White Lace, palest whites in pearly, liquid shades. And Pearl White.

Strike the mood, from black to white to sparkling blue with crystal flecks. Shimmer with flecks of silver in lime polish, gold polish and multi-prismed silver polish.

The latest in nail technology allows you to paint your nails and go out right away instead of waiting around for them to dry.

Fine footwear, that's shoe biz

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Comfortable or fashionable – that was the choice women used to have to make when buying shoes.

But not these days. The shoe industry has come a long way in recent years, offering women a choice of footwear that is both comfortable and fashionable, according to Howard Share, owner of Marquis Shoes (484-0104).

"We specialize in providing quality, well-fitting shoes with fashion," Share said recently. "Our motto is fashion with comfort and fit."

The 11-year-old store located at 3237 Yonge St,. just north of Lawrence Avenue, specializes in women's fine footwear – both casual and formal – in a wide range of widths from AA to D, he said.

He carries many of the international lines known for casual comfort. Two of his most popular are Ecco, the Danish-based line manufactured in Europe, and Naot, the well-known Israeli sandal and clog company, he said.

He also has a large selection of Stuart's and Mr. Seymour which are produced in Spain by Stuart Weitzman, as well as a variety of fashionable Italian designs which include Nickels, Sesto Meucci, Van Eli and Rangoni.

Share lauded the quality, styling and craftsmanship of the Italian designers. "The ones I'm dealing with use the best quality materials."

Marquis also stocks high quality domestic shoes and boots, including La Vallée, and Thomas Wallace which come in combination fittings – AA toes and AAAA heels, for example. There is also a wide selection of the popular Sorel boots.

Share stressed the importance of wearing comfortable shoes. "I have a simple philosophy. Clothing covers your body. Your shoes carry your body. They are the foundation for everything else. Ill-fitting clothing will not hurt you. Ill-fitting shoes can damage you for life."

This summer, Share noted, the shoes styles "are like hemlines. Anything goes." High-heel shoes with pointy toes as well as the clunkier round and square-toed shoes with heavier heels are all in style.

He said he is finding basic colors like bones, beiges, earth tones, and navy, are very much in demand this spring. White is not as popular as it used to be, he said, because the season for white is too short.

Share started in the shoe business as a part-timer some 30 years ago. He established Marquis Shoes after identifying a specific market niche that needed to be filled, he said. "There was a definite need in the AA business. I've gone to wider widths due to the demand."

He said Marquis carries a wide range of sizes: medium or B widths are available in sizes 4½ to 11; AA widths are available in 7½ to 11; and C and D widths are available in sizes 6½ to 10.

Sizzling shimmer – says summer in the city. Romance is in the air, you can just feel it. Metallic frosts caress the shoulders, hips and cheeks. Makeup becomes your favorite jewelry.

Skin Protection is essential. I'm sure you know that excessive sun exposure is known to be the chief cause of premature aging of skin, causing wrinkling, sagging and discoloration, but did you know that UVA rays can go through windows and clothing on sunny and cloudy days? UVA penetrates deeply causing damage of collagen and elastin without necessarily leaving a tan or a sunburn. UVB rays are the ones that turn your skin red, so take heed and never leave home without your sunblock in place.

"Hair this season is all about wash and wear" says, Daniel Fiorio of Salon Daniel. "Loads of shine and the softest textures play in the summer breeze. We are using many relaxing processes to straighten or control curls and for heaven's sake, don't cut your hair in layers as the fall season is bringing straighter, one-length styles." says the designer.

Redken unveils two new products to help create extra shine and texture – Undone and Water Wax. One is barely there, and one is obviously there – your choice.

Carol's tips:

• Skin care: It's a great season for fabulous new sun protection products, self-tanners, body moisturizers and yes, quite possibly, the answer to cellulite. For maximum benefit, remember to exfoliate before applying self-tanning products.

Cliniques Face-Zone Sun Block SPF 30 is a broad spectrum sunscreen that protects against the damage you see and the damage you don't. Try their Dark Self-Tanning Lotion. It will deliver a glorious deep tan in as little as three hours. Dior Bronze includes five new products. Its new formula is enriched with UVA and UVB sunscreens to give you a dazzling golden tan with genuine protection.

Estee Lauder's Go Bronz tinted face self-tanner works in two ways, immediately and in about one hour. Your sunless tan develops and looks so real you'd think you had been at the beach all afternoon.

Lauder has also launched a collection of self-action sunless supertan products that even includes an upside down spray for those hard to reach places. It promises a streak-free tan so natural only you will know it's fake. Their advanced suncare collection is Paba-free and gentle enough for the most sensitive skin.

Flash Bronzer Instant Dry Self Tanning Spritz from Lancome provides radiant and uniform color that dries quickly and you can dress immediately after application. This amber colored water spray delivers a streakless, sun-kissed tan within 45 minutes.

Book reveals swimwear's history of fashion

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Coordinator

Under the influence of North American designers such as Norma Kamali and Rose Marie Reid, the swimsuit has undergone a staggering transformation since the '40s.

Hems and inseams have been added, and the fibre and tweed have been rewoven into some of the most revealing and innovative garments history has known.

In Making Waves: Swimsuits and the Undressing of America (Raincoast Books, 1989), authors Lena Lencek and Gideon Bosker chronicle the evolution of the bathing suit. Swimwear has served as a marker for serious movements in fashion.

The first recorded case of bathing costumes originated in Greece, when public bathing was practised by "women of beauty and fine form." Streetwear togas were worn.

By 1850, bathing costumes consisted of the most fantastic assemblies. Ladies would improvise. Some would wear bloomers buckled nattily about the waist; others would wrap themselves in bright Turkish dressing gowns. Still others would wear old pantaloons and worn out jackets.

The bathing machine that took the bather out into the water was replaced by an awkward, bulky costume. Known as the Victorian bathing dress, the outfit included accessories such as parasols, gloves, and scarves.

By the late 19th century, customary bathing dress consisted of a pair of drawers and a skirt reaching to about three inches above the ankles. It was secured at the waist by a fabric belt. The drawers were plain or styled with lace and tightly banded at the ankle.

Classic Victorian look

Well into the 1890s, women wore corsets under their bathing dresses, even when they ventured into the water. According to Lencek and Bosker, the prototypes of "modern" swim trunks left much to be desired. The first Jantzen suits weighed nine pounds when wet and had a tendency to fall down.

Fortunately for women, bathing designers dispensed with corsets at the turn of the century.

By the end of World War I, bathing suits were decidedly keeping pace with fashion. Swimwear was rigged with sashes and teamed up with silk stockings, laced slippers and a hat. Even attempting the dog paddle must have posed problems!

The 1920s were restless, lawless years and the swelling tide of permissiveness made it possible for the maillot to make progress. By the end of the decade, Jantzen, Catalina and Cole became the recognized names in the new swimwear trend. According to Lencek and Bosker, the bathing suit came of age in 1930.

By 1939, two new latex fabrics were introduced and the bosom was molded by a brassiere constructed to provide good uplift.

Even a bathing cap can be a fashion statement.

By the end of the decade, the basic design of the female bathing suit included the maillot, the sheath, the two-piece and the dressmaker.

In 1943, rubber went to war and Cole's Margit Fellegi conceived a fabric made from parachute silk. It delivered the same snug fit as rubberized textiles.

The skimpy bikini bathing suit, which exposed the upper thigh, navel and back, first made waves in 1946. It was referred to as the "atome," a name that relates to Bikini, a remote southern reef in the Pacific which served as the base for atomic bomb tests after World War II.

In the '50s, Canadian designer Rose Marie Reid created swimsuits that molded a woman's figure. She also used water resistant fabric. From the '60s to the '90s, designers began to specialize in swimwear that served individual needs.

Today, everything from the maillot to the bikini prevails. Specialty shops carry bathing attire for pregnant, petite and plus-size swimmers.

Misconceptions about elderly addressed with insight

Temple Sinai presents Dance Like a Butterfly

By CINDY WAXER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dance Like A Butterfly examines people's misconceptions about the elderly with sensitivity, insight and humor.

Presented by the Temple Sinai Sisterhood and written by Montreal native Aviva Ravel, the play is scheduled to be performed Thursday, May 28. It stars Lisa Hurd as Tillie, a vibrant 85-year-old woman who has been placed in a geriatric ward of a hospital.

Confined to a wheelchair, Tillie's mind wanders to a past filled with joyous memories and heart-wrenching tragedies in order to come to terms with her present situation.

"[Tillie] is a very feisty old lady who really has not come to grips with the fact that she is 85-years-old and...she still wants to retain her independence," says Hurd.

Hurd was trained for the professional stage at the City Literary Institute and the Central School of Speech and Drama in London, England, and has received numerous awards for both acting and directing including the Theatre Canada Award for Best Performance by an Actress in a Leading Role and the Newfoundland and Labrador Drama Festival Award for Best Director.

Having performed in theatres in Ontario, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, England and Ireland, Hurd has also worked in film and on television, and boasts a long list of CBC Radio Drama credits.

But professional expertise alone could not properly prepare Hurd for playing the challenging role of Tillie. Instead, she focused upon her experiences as a caregiver to both her ailing mother and mother-in-law.

"[My mother] was this lady who was not going to give up and was not going to be a burden on us – she was just wonderful. And my mother-in-law...was a highly intelligent woman who could argue you under the table about history and politics and loved life. The combination of these two ladies inspired me," says Hurd.

Valuable lessons

Hurd also drew from her personal experiences as a child refugee. As a native of Austria, Hurd was forced to flee the country with her parents only six months prior to the start of the war. After arriving in England, she learned that dozens of her relatives had perished in the concentration camps.

Yet despite her firsthand knowledge of the feelings associated with alienation and a loss of independence, the appeal of Dance Like A Butterfly is not confined to those who have persevered under dire circumstances. Instead, the play contains valuable lessons for people of all backgrounds, experiences and ages.

"We all tend to forget and to lump old people into one category. We don't remember that every old person has been a young person and their life has been made up of so many rich experiences," says Hurd.

Tickets, $10, are available from Jean Glazer (416) 441-2297, Marilyn Jacobs (416) 488-5494 or Dolores Abramson (905) 881-0080.

In the Spotlight: Edgardo Mortara was a 6-year-old boy living with his large Jewish family in a town in northern Italy when the family's Catholic maid covertly baptised him. In 1858, that was all that was required for the Catholic authorities to intervene, claiming the child was now Catholic and could not be raised in a Jewish family. With the full blessings of a cardinal and archbishop, the local priest used legal means to send a squad of police to the Mortara residence to forcibly and permanently separate the frightened child from his family.

Last year, author David Kertzer published an account of this little-known episode in Jewish-Catholic relations. As The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara (Knopf, 1997) relates, Edgardo's parents did not give up their fight for his return, not even when they learned that their son had become the personal protégé of the Pope and was being groomed for the priesthood.

Despite interventions by Moses Montefiore and numerous statesmen, the church refused to return the boy to his family, asserting that the family should bow to the church's stronger claim on his immortal soul. Ultimately, Edgardo became a priest, and when his parents finally gained access to him, he wanted to have little to do with them or with his Jewish background. His anti-Jewish tirades were a common theme of his lectures from the pulpit, and he remained antagonistic to the Jews until his death in 1940.

Zimriya set for June 2

The 1998 Zimriya (choral festival) will take place at 8 p.m. on June 2 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

This free event, organized by Jewish Music Toronto, is an opportunity for the whole community to participate in celebration of Jewish music, either as listeners or performers.

Choirs slated to appear include the Zemer Chorale, the Holy Blossom Singers, Lachan, Ne'imot Singers, Beth Tikvah Choir, Temple Sinai Choir and the the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir.

"This is a special year for us," said organizer Charles Heller referring to Israel's 50th anniversary. "This watershed year in Jewish history has affected the way we respond to Jewish music of the past and the way Jewish music is written today.

Celebration of Jewish music

"Such a concert would have been inconceivable 100 years ago," he said. "If the great Jewish composers of the past – Rossi, Mendelssohn, Offenbach, Mahler – would be here for our Zimriya they would be filled with awe and wonder. Who knows what they might have composed as a result!"

Heller will also conduct the combined choirs in music by Israeli composers.

In Memoriam Primo Levi brings together Canada, Italy and the Jewish community in a moving composition sung by the mezzo-soprano voice of Sandra Boyes. Reeves was a friend of Levi's for 25 years and wrote this song after his death to honor his memory.

In Memoriam embodies two texts, the first a poem by Levi, Shema, and the second a poem by Reeves, This Was a Man.

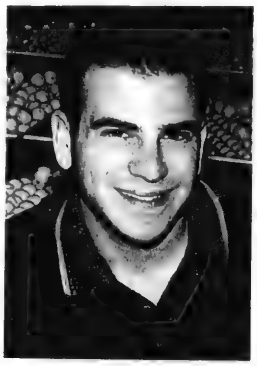
Golf balls sell like hotcakes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter



Jeffrey Shuster

TORONTO — When Jeffrey Shuster got into the used golf ball business four years ago, he was a casual golfer at best. Over the course of time he's developed a greater appreciation for the sport, but now he's barely got time to get in a round.

His business, Good As New Golf Balls, is keeping him so busy hopping from store to store that he hasn't had time to hit the links yet this season. With this year's early spring, Good As New has been selling used golf balls about as fast as they can be placed on the shelves, er, make that in the bins.

"I can't believe it," the 25-year-old entrepreneur said recently. "We've been doing on Saturdays in April the kind of business we did on Saturdays in July and August last year…The warehouse is almost empty."

Since last summer, Good As New has added a third store in Oak Ridges, north of Toronto, to go with the original outlet on Doncaster in Thornhill and the company's second store at Dundas and Dixie in Mississauga. Whatever the location, people have been snapping up the gently used golf balls at a frantic pace.

Shuster is forecasting that the Thornhill store alone will sell approximately 800,000 balls this year and that overall, the three outlets will move more than one million balls. At an average price of 98 cents a ball, that's about $1 million in gross sales.

Each store stocks about 20,000 to 30,000 balls at any one time, but the most popular items by far are the most expensive, particularly the top of the line balls such as Titleists, Shuster said. Precept Extra Spin have been very hot. At prices half their retail cost, bargain-hunting golfers are snapping up the balls.

Instead of paying $36 or even $50 for a dozen new balls, those same balls can be found at Good As New for $18 to $25, he said.

Unlike other stores selling used golf balls, Good As New packages premium balls in clear plastic containers, allowing consumers to walk into the store, find their balls of choice, plunk down their money and be on the way to the course in only five minutes, he said.

"We cater to the higher end, educated golfer who doesn't want to look through a bin," Shuster said.

Prices have not gone up in four years, Shuster pointed out. Titleist DT, HVC and HP2 sell for $15.79 a dozen, while other popular brands like Pinnacle, Ultra, Top-Flite are similarly discounted. There's even a bargain bin, titled "fishbait," for more frugal golfers or for those who may want to have a disposable ball in their bag when they shoot over a water hazard.

Balls packaged by Good As New are almost indistinguishable from new balls, he said. Many that are brought to the 2,500-square-foot Doncaster warehouse/store are prewashed by the divers who find them. Those that aren't are washed, sorted and put out on display.

Since opening the business in 1995, Shuster has exceeded his expectations. In year one, the Doncaster store sold about 200,000 balls and "each year since then, this store has almost doubled."

Last year, the Mississauga outlet sold about 100,000 balls, even though it didn't open until sometime in May, fairly late in the season.

In his initial year of operation, Shuster advertised only once, in the Toronto Star golf supplement. Since then, he's spent little on promotion. "Our best advertising is our customers. We lose very few," he said.

Though he loses few customers, Shuster can be happy they lose plenty of balls. According to statistics cited by Shuster, the average golfer loses two balls during a round of golf. When you consider that golf is North America's most popular participatory sport and that more and more rounds are being played each year, there are hundreds of millions of balls waiting to be found, Shuster said.

Meanwhile, Shuster has been branching out, adding golf tchatchkes like soft spikes, gloves, wood covers and other equipment to his inventory. This year, he's added a line of golf clothing called UDAMON Golf Gear and he offers club regripping and a custom-built club service.

Firm finds film locations

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Do you think the house in the made-for-TV movie you're watching looks like the house around the corner? Chances are, it is.

Your neighbors may have signed on with Film Locations and All-Star Accommodations Inc.

Shelley Blechman, owner of the 3-year-old company, provides locations for the film industry, as well as accommodations for those involved with the film, such as the director, the producer and their assistants.

The idea for such a business was conceived, says Blechman, after her parents' home was used to shoot a shampoo commercial.

"I realized that it was difficult for the film industry to locate upscale homes. I began asking my family and friends to use their homes as film sites, and the whole business snowballed."

Her agency runs much like a casting agency, she says. "Clients call and sign up their homes. I maintain a portfolio, and when film people like what they see, I set up an appointment for them to see the home in person. If it is what they're looking for, it's a match.

"Some houses are film-friendly. We usually look for big, bright rooms to work in – furniture is secondary. It is also necessary to find homes that fit the script. For example, the film crew may need a house with a bay window in the kitchen. We pull out the portfolio of homes and give them a choice of about 12 homes that fit their description."

Clients can be assured their homes will be taken care of, says Blechman, because she only deals with reputable production companies.

Clients get an allowance for having their homes used, and if they have to move out while filming is in process, they are given money for their alternate accommodation.

Her agency's homes have been used for television shows such as Traders, Ghostwriters and PSI Factor, the Blues Brothers 2000 movie and many commercials for companies including The Bay and a line of Sabrina toys.

Blechman says when it comes to accommodating the cast and crew of movies, "everything is very personal. Some people want midtown condos, others want secluded homes with pools. I provided the Rolling Stones and their families with locations when they were here, – they paid about $60,000 a month for their accommodation. Tom Cruise and Nicole Kidman stayed in one of my homes and Bette Midler also stayed in one of my midtown locations."

Clients who rent out their homes, she says, can take the opportunity to travel or live in another of their properties.

Virginia peninsula a must see for Civil War buffs

By JOSIE NEWMAN-PROVOST
Special to The CJN

If you are driving south along Interstate 95, you should take a detour near Richmond, Va., and follow Interstate 64 south-east to the new Peninsula Campaign Trail.

Many historic and modern attractions await you on the "trail," which opened in June 1997. A compilation of 36 sites that marked the history of the Peninsula Campaign of the American Civil War, they are all close to Route 64 and its offshoot, Route 664.

Named after a battle that took place on the peninsula jutting out into Chesapeake Bay, the campaign was a plan of attack for Union forces against the Confederate army. The end result, though, was the victory of the Confederate army of 13,000 men over a force of 121,500 Union soldiers.

It takes a couple of days to tour all the sites stretching from Richmond to Fort Munroe at the tip of the peninsula. Some of the more interesting sites are Endview Plantation, believed to have been the site of Union headquarters during the Civil War; Lee Hall, headquarters for the Confederate forces of John Magruder; and Fort Monroe, a Union fort for 15 years. Built in 1819, it is the largest stone fortification ever built in the United States.

We started our tour at a medium-sized town called Newport News. In a strategic location 97 kilometres south-east of Richmond and 20 minutes from Virginia Beach on Chesapeake Bay, Newport News is being touted as a future tourist mecca. Its main industries are now shipping, shipbuilding and the United States Navy, but its potential is enormous.

The town is home to a number of world-class museums, biking and hiking trails, a burgeoning beach, many parks, and several good restaurants and motels. The Civil War sites include the Battle of Dam No. 1 in Newport News Park, the Mariners' Museum and the War Memorial Museum of Virginia.

The Battle of Dam No. 1 in April 1862 was Union general George McClellan's only attempt, albeit unsuccessful, to break through Confederate defences along the Warwick River, which runs through Newport News. More than eight kilometres of earthwork fortifications built by Confederate major-general John Magruder in the woods near the river are still mostly intact.

They are so carefully concealed behind trees and hills that it's not hard to understand why the Union army was stymied in its attempt. Strolling through the area makes for a beautiful walk on a sunny afternoon. There are signs along the way explaining the battle, as well as a mural depicting the battle scene. The site in Newport News Park is located next to a wildlife sanctuary.

The Mariners' Museum is one of the largest international maritime museums in the world. Its buildings boast more than 35,000 maritime items, including ship models, maritime paintings and navigational instruments. One of its most popular exhibits is the Clash of Armor, an exhibit that tells the story of the Civil War battle between the USS Monitor and the CSS Virginia.

The Crabtree Miniature Collection of Ships is also housed here, the only one of its kind in the world. It was built by August Crabtree, a craftsman from Seattle who spent 28 years toiling over the miniature ships with dental tools.

Lee Hall, the Italian-style mansion where John Magruder and another Confederate general, Joseph Johnson, planned their defence for the Battle of Dam No. 1, is on the outskirts of Newport News.

It is a charming cotton-era plantation home, one of the last on the peninsula, and the place from which the first Confederate hot air balloon was sent up to spy on the Union Army from the earthworks on the front lawn. Built around 1850 by Richard Decauter Lee, Lee Hall was a tobacco plantation until 1861, when it became Confederate headquarters. Under renovations for the past several months, Lee Hall will reopen this spring as a museum and will be available for tours in the summer.

A couple of miles up the road at Endview Plantation, a modest white frame house built between 1720 and 1760, archeologists have recently unearthed what they believe was the secret site of the campaign headquarters of the Union Army. Most of the "evidence" came from the root cellar, including a Civil War soldier's hat-pin and a pinky ring, said Tracy Northcott, the archeologist in charge of the dig. The house is also pictured in the background of a black-and-white photograph of McClellan and his soldiers.

"The implication of having two headquarters down the road from one another are incredible, when you think of the Union forces operating in secret right under the noses of the Confederates," said Suzanne Pearson, media relations and promotions manager for the Newport News Tourism Development Office.

Another 15 minutes south-east of Newport News lies Fort Munroe, a picturesque spot at the tip of the peninsula across the water from its Civil War companion, Fort Wool. The view is tremendous, especially on a clear, sunny day. It takes about 40 minutes to walk around the ramparts of the whole fort.

You can see the moat surrounding Fort Munroe, the barracks of Navy families and the families themselves at play or the servicemen performing drills. Walking through the former barracks and headquarters operations under the fort is equally interesting. There is also a wonderful museum and gift shop.

The Peninsula Campaign Trail is worth a separate trip if you're a history buff; even if you're not, it's still worth the detour.

GERSON, Prof. Frederick - Peacefully at home, surrounded by his family on May 17, 1998 after a 2 1/2 year battle with cancer. Devoted husband to Simone, loyal son to Françoise and loving father of Daphne, Aviva & Joel. He will be missed by his cousins in Paris, and by his family in Israel. Fred died as he lived, with the utmost dignity and courage: respected and loved by those who knew him. Fred survived the Holocaust and came to a new country where he put himself through school, eventually earning a Phd. He will be remembered at the U of T, where he taught French and Jewish Studies for 32 yrs. An active Board member and former President of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies for 18 yrs, his insight and dedication to the Middle Eastern conflict and to Jewish history will be missed by his fellow colleagues. He will also be missed by his chess partner and longtime friend, Joel Freedman. We are grateful for the support and compassion offered by all his wonderful caregivers from V.O.N. & Olsten. The family especially appreciated the dedication and generosity of Michael Gitberg RN and Dr. Russell Goldman whose warmth and support carried us through each day. All those who knew Fred will remember him for his dry wit and brilliant intellect. If desired, donations may be made, in lieu of flowers: The Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation, 946-6560.

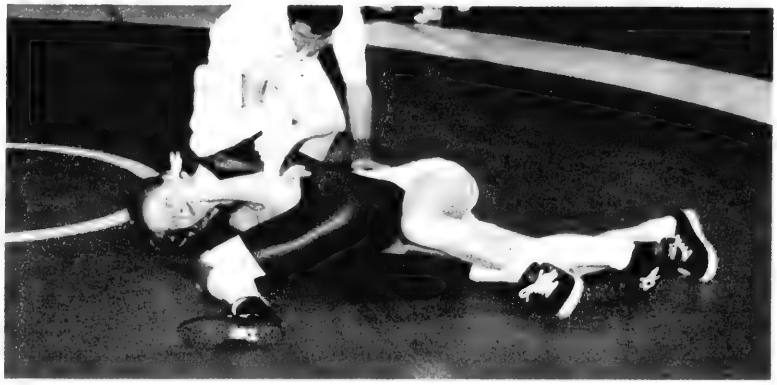
Petite athlete loves rough and tumble sports

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter



Sarah Gamliel gets the upper hand on an opponent

TORONTO — You might call Sarah Gamliel one of the new breed of women athletes. You know the type, the independently minded, know-no-barriers females who see no reason why they shouldn't compete against boys in rough and tumble, contact sports.

How else to explain why a petite Grade 12 student at McKenzie Collegiate loves the not-so-dainty world of wrestling and lacrosse. Historically the preserve of testosterone-charged young males, these sports are increasingly attracting young female athletes who not only participate in the rugged activities, but excel at them too.

Last year, wrestling against other women in the 40-kilogram freestyle class, Gamliel finished fourth in Canada at the national championships in New Brunswick with a 2-2 record.

Her wrestling schedule in 1997 was more than hectic, with matches in Ohio, New Brunswick, Guelph, London, Hamilton and points in between. At a tournament held during the Ohio State Fair, Gamliel and some female colleagues from the Metro Toronto Wrestling Association (MTWA) wrestled against young men. "We got our butts kicked, but it was fun," she said.

Nineteen ninety-eight has been a quieter year on the tournament circuit, though Gamliel trained regularly at her club and with McKenzie's school team, which includes 14 girls and a slightly larger number of boys. Her best showing was a first place finish at the Montreal Open.

In both 1997 and '98, Gamliel represented McKenzie at the North York and Tri-City Championships and was champion in the 40-kg girls' division.

As much as Gamliel does well at wrestling, it's certainly not her only sport. She loves to play soccer and she participates in lunchtime intramural sports at McKenzie. Last year, she and a girlfriend tried out for the boys' lacrosse team – and made the cut. This year, she's the only girl on the team, but she isn't bothered by that unique status.

"Me, I like the physical sports. I'm different," she said.

"My girlfriends think I'm crazy, especially with the lacrosse," she admits. She experienced a similar attitude in grades 9 and 10 when she first considered taking up wrestling after participating in more traditional female sports like softball and track.

"It looked like fun," Gamliel said. "It's something different. It was challenging.

"I started it and I loved it," she continued. "A four-minute match takes so much out of you. It's exhausting and at tournaments you might wrestle four or five matches a day."

Gamliel especially enjoys the tactical aspects of the sport. "A lot of coaches explain wrestling as a chess game. If you move, there's a countermove. You have to know how to react to what a person is doing to you."

So far, Gamliel has managed to avoid serious injury while pursuing her interest in contact sports. She's suffered no more than tricep bursitis and she "smashed up" her thumb once, but all it required was a tape job and she was able to go out and compete.

In 1997, Gamliel trained between 15 and 20 hours a week (including grappling with boys for competition) but this year, she had to cut back on her hours because of all the other sports she's involved with and because she also has a part time job as a cashier. She also volunteers at least three hours a week with two community groups.

"It's very tiring," she conceded. "I'm always running somewhere."

When she's through with high school Gamliel doesn't plan to be through with wrestling. She expects to continue her education in university and she'll be looking for a school that offers its own female wrestling team.

A DIPLOMATIC PITCH

The Inside Back

Currency regulations create confusion and frustration

A couple from Pittsburgh who spend half their time in Israel decided to purchase an apartment in Jerusalem.

The negotiations with the vendors were nothing compared to the complicated decisions that had to be made regarding financing the apartment in such a way that when the day comes that they want to sell the property, they will be able to convert the proceeds back into dollars and take the money out of the country.

A woman from New York was involved in a lawsuit against her sister regarding their parents' estate here in Israel. Although she won the case, it will take her several years to convert her inheritance and take it abroad, because Israeli currency regulations restrict the amount she can convert and take out of the country each year.

A woman from the United States inherited an apartment in Jerusalem and had a buyer who was willing to pay in dollars, but she lost the deal when she learned that making such a sale would turn her into a criminal, as all transactions in Israel must be in local currency.

The above stories are true and involved clients of mine. For Canadians and Americans used to being able to buy and sell currency as they please, the thicket of regulations governing Israel's currency has always been a source of confusion and frustration.

The foreign currency liberalization announced before Israel's 50th Independence Day has therefore been welcomed with relief by businesspeople interested in trading in Israel or investing here. Nonetheless, even for someone who simply wishes to buy a home here, the change will make the investment more attractive.

In fact, Israel's currency has always been controlled, and from the early days of the country's existence, its leaders were afraid that if people were free to trade in currency at will, there would be a run on the lira and disastrous consequences for the economy.

The Law of Supervision of the Currency therefore forbids all transactions in foreign currency, unless a permit is granted. A general permit was issued by the government and subsequently amended several times, permitting all sorts of transactions under various different conditions.

Understanding these rules and implementing them has been next to impossible for most lay people.

The new rules reverse the principle. From now on, everything will be permitted, unless it is explicitly forbidden, instead of the other way around. This difference is not merely semantic; it means that the basic principle is a person's freedom to conduct transactions, while each restriction has to be explicitly stated.

Essentially, the Israeli shekel is now an almost fully convertible currency, and people are free to trade in it or conduct business in Israel in foreign currency.

Naturally, this comes with a price and not all have been in favor of the move. For example, opponents of the liberalization have pointed to the chaos created in Asia by currency speculators. Furthermore, they see it as a move designed to help the wealthier people who can afford to invest abroad or take expensive trips while at the same time eroding the social safety net.

Proponents argue that damage caused by currency speculation is a result of poor economics, not its cause, and that the change will enforce financial discipline on the Israeli government. Furthermore, they argue, the Israeli economy is now strong enough to take the currency swings.

This remains to be seen, but it is clearly true that governments will not be as free to use deficits to finance job creation. The debate over this issue is ideological, and if there is one thing both sides appear to agree on, it is that the move from a controlled currency to a free one is symbolic of the country's continuing move from a socialist economy to a capitalist one.

Whether one believes that the government should be able to make economic decisions without having to worry about currency speculators, or that market forces will ensure that the economy grows stronger, it is certain that the new rules will make life a lot easier for individuals on both sides of the ocean who wish to transact business and move money in and out of Israel.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I made a pact with myself that if I didn't meet someone decent by my birthday, I would learn how to use the Internet and join a Jewish singles group in cyberspace.

So here it is two months later and I have been chatting with a wonderful gentleman. Jeremy is a recently divorced physician who is as lonely as I am. He is warm and kind and we have shared many intimate details of our lives over the computer. We seem to be very compatible.

He has been pressuring me to meet him in person and my instincts tell me that he is everything I have ever dreamed of. I am very excited and have not had this kind of adrenaline rush in years.

I know in my heart I am ready to meet Jeremy; however, I have heard some horror stories about meeting people from the Internet and I am nervous he will turn out to be a dud, or worse, some mad man. Do you think I should meet him?

Single in Cyberspace

Dear Single in Cyberspace,

Developing relationships in cyberspace are very different from the traditional ways of meeting a mate. The anonymity of cyberspace provides a safety blanket that allows you to get close very quickly. You can feel very connected to someone in a matter of hours. Your mind takes over and you transfer your hopes and dreams into your cyber meetings. This has very good and very dangerous connotations.

The next step is to exchange pictures through e-mail. Have an idea of who you are talking to. If possible do a little detective work and try to verify some of the details he has told you.

Once you are sure you want to lose the safety blanket and take this from cyberspace to reality, you can exchange phone numbers and get a feel for Jeremy over the phone. When you are actually ready to meet him in person, make sure you do so in a public place. Do not have any private rendezvous with him until you feel comfortable that he truly is the man he has portrayed himself to be. Err on the side of caution.

Cyberspace is a wonderful new avenue for meeting people, but as with anything good, there are always some pitfalls.

Be careful and good luck.

Israel consulate may close

Effort underway to save Montreal office

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish community leaders are trying to prevent the reported closing of the Israeli Consulate here.

And their efforts are taking place amid conflicting speculation over whether any final decision had yet been made by Israel's Foreign Ministry, which is being forced by the Finance Ministry to slash its budget and close diplomatic missions overseas.

The report, which appeared in the May 27 Hebrew language daily Ma'ariv, named the Montreal Israeli Consulate General, which has been in operation for over 40 years, as among the overseas missions that "will be closed." Others included missions in Atlanta, Philadelphia, and Marseille, France.

But Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Aviv Shiron, speaking to The CJN from Jerusalem last Thursday, said no final decision has been made about Montreal or any other consulate.

"What I can say is that due to budget cuts, Israel's Foreign Ministry is considering closing down some foreign missions. But there is no specific list. These are press speculations. Any reaction is premature since no decision has been made."

Shiron's denial of there being a "specific list" and comments about "press speculation,"

United Church reaches out to Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish officials are using some of the most effusive language in memory to hail a landmark United Church of Canada document on relations with Jews and Judaism.

The document is said to be a first in North America, and the most far-reaching effort by Canadian Christians at conciliation with Jews. It calls on Canada's largest Protestant denomination to completely re-examine its relations with Jews and to stop interpreting Scriptures in ways that may lead to anti-Jewish stereotyping.

Entitled Bearing Faithful Witness: United Church-Jewish Relations Today, the report is not an apology for the church's silence during the Holocaust, or its tense relations with Jews which existed into the 1960s. Rather, it proposes new guidelines "for the relationship [of members] with Jews and Judaism, and for the related interpretation of Scripture within the United Church of Canada."

The need for change is ripe, explain the report's authors, "because in our churches, Jesus is rarely referred to as a Jew; because there is rising anti-Judaism, anti-Semitism, white supremacy and neo-Nazism in Canada and other countries in the name of Jesus Christ; [and] because we are finally understanding that Christian denial of Jesus' Jewishness contributed to pogroms, the Holocaust, the refusal to admit refugees, and other horrors against the Jewish people."

The report concedes there "is little reaction" from the Christian community when synagogues and Jewish cemeteries are desecrated, and that Jews "could feel attacked" by Christian Scriptures "and our interpretation of them."

The document must still be debated and receive final approval from the church's general

Prayer Solutions Sought

JERUSALEM — The committee charged with finding compromises in the crisis over religious pluralism is considering possible solutions to the controversy regarding women praying at the Western Wall.

The Reform and Conservative movements and a group known as the Women of the Wall have reportedly agreed to a proposal under which there would be an alternative prayer plaza at the southern end of the wall.

Cabinet to Reject Proposal

JERUSALEM — Deputy Israeli Premier Moshe Katzav said the entire cabinet would reject an American proposal for Israel to make a further withdrawal from 13 percent of the West Bank to advance the peace process.

Tourism In A Slump

JERUSALEM — The tourism industry is still mired in a slump that began with a series of terrorist attacks two years ago, according to an official of the Israel Hotel Association. Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics released figures putting average hotel occupancy rates at 52.8 percent during the first four months of 1998, compared to 59.3 percent during the same period in 1997 and 67.7 percent in 1996.

Information Shared

BUENOS AIRES — The United States and Argentina agreed to share information in an effort to combat international terrorism. The decision was announced after a meeting between Argentina's President Carlos Menem and visiting U.S. Defence Secretary William Cohen.

Argentina has been unable to find those responsible for two terrorist bombings of Jewish sites in Buenos Aires in 1992 and 1994. Recent charges by Argentine officials than Tehran was involved in the bombings has resulted in the two countries all but suspending their diplomatic contacts.

Rabbi Killed in Accident

BALTIMORE — Rabbi Aryeh Leib Kaplan, founder of a Lubavitch community in the northern Israeli city of Safed where he had once served as vice-mayor, died in a car accident May 12.

The Baltimore Jewish Times reported that Rabbi Kaplan's car was struck by a truck in Belarus when he was travelling to Minsk to dedicate a new Lubavitch school and mikvah. He was buried in Israel.

Moshe Ronen becomes youngest CJC president

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Moshe Ronen, a former student radical, was acclaimed as the new president of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) at the 25th Plenary Assembly May 24 and 25 in Winnipeg.

CJC Plenary

At 39, the Israeli-born son of Holocaust survivors has become the youngest president in Congress' 79-year history.

"As we celebrate and as we sound the horn loud on Israel's jubilee, and on the dawn of a new millennium and renewed hope, I accept with a steady hand, with confidence and humility, the torch of leadership, passed on by those who suffered, sacrificed, strove courageously and built anew," he vowed.

Ronen thanked his family for their support. He thanked his predecessor, Goldie Hershon, whom he said, "has been one of the warmest, most caring and sensitive of presidents." He praised

Moshe Ronen

Winnipeg Jewish community leaders, including plenary chair Rael Ludwig, who hosted the triennial CJC assembly for the first time.

He promised that he has lost none of his student idealism and commitment to action over the years. He further noted the demands by student delegates at the plenary that student concerns be paid more attention and that young people be better represented in Congress decision-making bodies.

"I consider it the highest privilege to stand before you today as the youngest president of the Canadian Jewish Congress," he told delegates.

"During my presidency, Congress will not fudge the issues. We will continue to speak out boldly, exposing hypocrisy and confronting others on what is just. We will continue to speak out on the Holocaust, on anti-Semitism and all forms of racism, on multiculturalism and religious pluralism, on the social safety net, on terrorism, on Israel and on Jerusalem. We will continue to promote positive and vibrant intergroup relations and provide humanitarian relief for communities in distress both at home and abroad, foster Canadian unity and strengthen Jewish communal cohesion."

Earlier, outgoing president Goldie Hershon gave her farewell speech, reviewing her three years in office and touching on all aspects of the Canadian Jewish agenda. Hershon was undoubtedly the most travelled of CJC presidents. She visited almost every region of Canada. She was the first CJC president, for example, to visit Newfoundland and the Northwest Territories.

"I extend the best of luck to my successor, Moshe Ronen," she said.

"You can count on my complete support during the course of your mandate."

During the assembly, Congress recognized a number of people with special awards. The Saul Hayes Human Rights Award was bestowed on Canadian diplomat Mark Entwistle, a former Canadian ambassador to Israel who also represented Israel in Cuba from 1993-97 while also serving as Canadian ambassador to the island country. While serving in Cuba, he became quite involved with the Cuban Jewish community (although he himself is not Jewish). In his acceptance speech, he praised Congress for the instrumental role it has played in reviving the Cuban Jewish community.

Samuel Bronfman medals were presented to Congress past president Les Scheininger of Toronto and longtime CJC worker Bernard Finestone of Montreal. Milt Harris, another former CJC president, was appointed honorary president.

The Brian A. Finestone Memorial Award was given to Robert Presser, a young CJC leader from Montreal who is currently treasurer of the Quebec region. Ron CJC resolved that...

WINNIPEG — Resolutions on national unity created a measure of disunity at the Canadian Jewish Congress' 25th Plenary Assembly.

It wasn't that the dissenters were opposed to Congress support for the Calgary Declaration or the other two resolutions on the subject. It was just that some delegates were quite impressed by a speech given earlier in the day by Grand Chief Phil Fontaine (see related story), national chief of the Assembly of First Nations. These delegates felt that the resolutions should be reworded to include support for the rights of Canada's Native Peoples as well.

After much debate about whether the resolutions should be "deferred" or "referred" to the new executive or "postponed," the final result was that the resolutions were passed with one minor amendment.

A plenary notebook

The 25th plenary of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) was unlike any of the triennial gatherings that had ever preceded it.

In the first place, it was held in Winnipeg. Never before had the gathering been held outside Montreal or Toronto. Because there were fewer downtown "distractions" than in the past, people tended to be more highly focussed on the plenary program itself.

And in the second place, the program departed radically from the conventional plenary format.

The program was streamlined and, I would add, simplified. There were no simultaneously running sessions. That meant, of course, that delegates and reporters could attend all the sessions without exhausting themselves by running back and forth between different rooms.

As The CJN's western correspondent Myron Love has reported elsewhere in this issue, the heart of the plenary program consisted of six panel discussions, each one hour in duration.

The conference room in which the discussions were held was converted into a television studio; each session was videotaped. A professional facilitator, Jim Carr, responded to panel members and engaged members of the audience.

What transpired was the "Oprah Winfreyization" of the plenary. It was a celebration of soundbite over analysis and of form over substance.

However, the form was the substance. The sessions did not lend themselves to in-depth analyses by either panelists or delegates. On the other hand, the themes of the panel discussions – important though each one was – were the necessarily familiar ones that recur at all such Jewish organizational plenary meetings. As a result then, there was not likely a great deal of original wisdom left to shed any new, more penetrating light on the themes.

The delegates clearly enjoyed the format. It appeared to this observer that very few were shy about speaking into the microphone as the cameras were recording. A palpable sense of enthusiasm and energy filled the air. I would even say that there was a sense of enjoyment among the delegates.

The format therefore proved to be a boost to CJC morale and thus, an overall success. In addition, the end product videotapes will be able to serve as profile-raising, marketing devices in the future.

* * *

At the Sunday luncheon I met Mrs. Vera Kare Vogel and her daughter Mara. Both live in Calgary.

Vera was born in Winnipeg and settled in Calgary some 45 years ago. She graduated from the University of Manitoba in 1944 and then travelled to Montreal where she received her degree in social work from McGill Unviersity. After McGill, she went to Wayne State University in Detroit for her master's degree.

All her life, Vera has been a champion of causes. In her youth she was the head of Avukah Habonim. As a young adult, she helped bring about the downfall of the quota system for Jews at the University of Manitoba's faculty of medicine. She was also the first executive director of Jewish Child and Family Services in Winnipeg.

Mara, married with two children, is a lawyer who now runs a small business along with her husband. She is a member of the bar of both British Columbia and Alberta.

Both mother and daughter were delightful, engaging company. It became quickly very clear that Vera had passed on her concern for the well-being of humanity to her daughter.

Mara was the NDP candidate who ran against Preston Manning in the last federal election. It took a great deal of grit (if it is not improper to use the term in this context), courage and determination on her part. In fact, so pro-Reform was the riding, that Mara could not find anyone willing to rent her office space from which to run her campaign. Mara lost the election, badly, approximately 1,300 votes to Manning's 40,000. But there could be no shame in the result for Mara. Indeed the result was virtually predetermined.

When asked whether she felt daunted and overwhelmed at the prospect of running against the Reform Party leader, Mara answered: "As Jews, we believe in causes. When they seem hopeless, do we just give up?"

The size of her heart far exceeded the size of her vote.

It is a heart Mara obviously inherited from her mother. For Vera was the NDP candidate who ran, and lost, in the same riding in 1988 against the Tory Bobbie Sparrow.

Sunday evening, delegates travelled to the Asper Jewish Community Campus of Winnipeg. It is the brand new community centre, a recently renovated, elegant building that movingly combines older structures with newer functional designs such as high vaulted ceilings, the ubiquitous use of glass and the deliberately architectured penetration of natural light throughout a large part of the complex.

At the community campus, we were treated to a musical "salute to Israel's 50th," the centre-piece of which was a zesty, exciting performance by the Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble. It is a group of more than 50 young dancers and musicians whose movements and sounds were both a visual and auditory delight.

Bloor JCC planning to renovate building

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) is gearing up to launch a $5 million fundraising campaign that is intended to pay off the facility's debt and renovate the 45-year-old downtown building.

Dubbed the Commitment to Community Campaign, the fundraising effort will kick off in early 1999 and will coincide with the retail development of the building's Bloor Street frontage.

Subject to municipal approval, the Bloor JCC is planning to open its north facade to access from Bloor Street and create four retail spaces. Although no leases have been signed yet, the "anchor tenant" will likely be a coffee shop that will occupy the Bloor/Spadina corner while a bagel shop and a bookstore have already made inquiries about the other spaces, said Bill Emery, executive director of the Bloor JCC.

Altogether, 6,200 sq. ft of retail space will be developed. With a projected rental rate of about $40 a sq. foot, the project should generate about $248,000 a year in income for the centre, Emery said.

The goal is the creation of a virtually "brand new JCC," Emery said. Part of the renovations already on the drawing boards include:

- a new aerobics studio and multipurpose lounge in the space currently occupied by the chapel;
- a 290-seat theatre/projection room on the second floor in the space above the current auditorium;
- a "cardio theatre" featuring stationary bicycles and stairmasters on the second floor on the south side of the gym;
- relocation of the Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS) offices to the main floor on the Spadina side of the building.

The second floor JF&CS offices will be turned over to the Downtown Jewish Community Day School, which plans to launch its first year of operations in September with 40 students. In addition, the space will be used by the Downtown Jewish Community School, the supplemental school that convenes on Sunday morning and Wednesday evening, Emery said.

With the new day school, with the centre's longstanding athletic membership and with its supporters among culture and arts groups, "this centre is truly the heart of the Jewish community downtown," Emery said.

> 'The heart of Jewish downtown'

Despite that optimism, questions about the campaign are sure to arise in the wake of the centre's earlier, L'Chaim campaign that raised $2.2 million of its $5 million target. In addition, a $750,000 donation the centre was relying on fell through over disagreement whether the building would be named for the donor (the Bloor JCC's position), or whether the entire facility would be named for him (the donor's position).

Despite those setbacks, the money raised in the L'Chaim campaign ($75,000 was the largest single contribution), coupled with $750,000 provided to the centre by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, helped the membership acquire the centre, pay off part of the JCC's debts and make some changes to the facility. Banks are still owed $2.3 million, Emery acknowledged.

Emery believes things are different now than they were four years ago during the start of the L'Chaim campaign. Back then, the JCC (which at the time included the Bathurst Street branch) teetered on the verge of bankruptcy. Members departed in droves, leaving the Bloor JCC with only 1,945 members compared to its current total of 3,000.

Today, says Emery, members and donors can look back on four years of stability and prudent management. When the centre launched its earlier campaign, "people wanted to see a solvent JCC that was going to stay," he said.

Since then, the Bloor JCC has paid $1.5 million to the banks in principal and interest, developed a sound business plan and consistently generates $100,000 in surplus on its annual operations.

"People will support a winner," Emery predicted.

A successful $5 million campaign will pay off the $2.3 million still owed the banks, finance the $2.2 million renovations and leave the centre with a nice financial cushion. "We still need a major donor who looks at the Bloor JCC today [with] its presence at the corner of Bloor and Spadina, and sees it as an exciting opportunity," he added.

Municipal approvals are still required for the planned renovations, but Emery was confident they would be forthcoming. "We hope to have everything lined up by Rosh Hashanah, the financing, leases and approvals. We're hoping to put the shovel in the ground by late fall or early winter," he said.

Emunah Women launches scholarships for study in Israel

By STACEY STEIN
Student Intern

TORONTO — Two graduating high school students were recently awarded with scholarships for study in Israel at the annual Emunah Women of Toronto Mother-in-Israel dinner.

The scholarships were presented in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary, and will now be awarded annually on the basis of community involvement, demonstration of leadership skills and an essay.

The recipients were Esther Maman and Julie Lupas, who are both graduating from Ulpanat Orot. Although the scholarship is intended for one student, the award was split in half because there were so many qualified candidates.

"We wanted something to encourage young girls to go to Israel," a committee member said.

The event, which took place at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, also featured guest speaker Rachael Turkienicz, director of Judaic studies at a local Jewish day school and the first woman to hold a rabbinic teaching position at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. Turkienicz, who lectures widely across Toronto and Boston, spoke about the role of women's groups in fulfilling obligations toward Israel.

"The fact that we have obligations to Eretz Yisrael is almost self-evident," Turkienicz said. "We have many rules that talk about how we should settle the land,...how we should plant and harvest the land, and be part of the land.

"We are constantly being reminded of our connection to the land, we are constantly being reminded of our devotion."

The evening began with dinner, and included a d'var Torah, the scholarship presentations and the welcoming of new executive members.

The Mother-in-Israel campaign has been running for 25 years. It allows Emunah Women to take care of a child's physical needs by helping them financially. The dinner is a celebration of the campaign and Emunah Women's projects.

Emunah Women is an international organization, with chapters in Canada, the United States, Australia and South Africa. The organization provides services for new immigrants to Israel, helping them settle in the country. It also runs 250 projects in Israel, including several orphanages, day-care centres, women's shelters, literacy programs and family counselling.

Emunah Women is also the only designated institution that is allowed to remove children from their homes on a crisis basis.

"We are sensitive to the issues of what is happening in Israel now," said Edie Kalb, president of Emunah Women of Toronto. "We're sensitive to the needs of the newcomers who are having a real hard time."

She added that Emunah Women institutions maintain a religious environment, which she says is important in a country "that is having a real hard time now religiously."

Emanuel Foundation to honor memory of Holocaust hero

TORONTO — The memory of Eugene Winter, a Holocaust survivor who went on to aid hundreds of fellow Hungarian survivors in Canada, will be honored at a June 10 dinner by the Emanuel Foundation.

It will be the first time the foundation will hold its annual event in Canada.

The dinner, co-sponsored by the Toronto Simcha Congregation, will also honor the memories of Alan, Ethel and Larry Grossman. It will take place at the Le Parc Banquet Centre in Thornhill, beginning at 6:30 p.m.

Special guest will be Kelly Curtis, wife of actor Tony Curtis, who started the Emanuel Foundation in memory of his Hungarian-Jewish father, Emanuel Schwartz. The non-profit foundation is dedicated to perpetuating the memory of the Holocaust.

World-renowned tenor Tibor Kelen is scheduled to give a performance, and local politicians are expected to attend.

Winter, who died in 1995, was widely regarded as a hero in Canada's Hungarian Jewish community. As a member of the underground during World War II, he smuggled children out of work camps and helped liberate several towns and cities from the Nazis.

In 1956, the year Soviet troops invaded Hungary, he helped arrange the reception and settlement of some 10,000 Hungarian Jews in Toronto.

Winter was also active in numerous Jewish charities and causes.

Proceeds from the dinner will go toward completion of the Raoul Wallenberg Memorial Park in Budapest, named for the Swedish war hero credited with rescuing 100,000 Hungarian Jews during the Holocaust, as well as a documentary film on Jewish resistance during the war.

Hoops for Hope set for June 7

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The third annual Hoops for Hope three-on-three basketball tournament will be held at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre June 7 from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m.

The event will benefit the Audey Stanleigh Leukemia Research Foundation, which supports new and innovative research at the Hospital for Sick Children, as well as bone marrow testing through Canadian Friends of Jay Feinberg.

Male and Female basketball players, ages 12 and over and of all skill levels, may compete. Organizers expect 500 players, and have organized media celebrity games, trophies, door prizes, and a three-point shootout.

For players 12 and up

Audey Stanleigh, a popular Thornhill resident, suffered from acute lymphoblastic leukemia. When he received a bone marrow transplant from a Windsor man who had originally been tested for New Jersey leukemia patient Jay Feinberg, Stanleigh, along with Ilan Meister, organized Hoops for Hope, originally called Play for Jay, as a way of giving thanks for his good fortune.

Meister is still the director.

Stanleigh died in August 1996, at age 21, of post-transplant complications. Hoops for Hope has been carried on by an independent group of volunteers, many of them Stanleigh's friends and supporters.

Since its beginning, Hoops for Hope has raised nearly $60,000, through registration costs, personal and corporate donations, and corporate sponsorships.

Israeli society 'less cohensive' after 50 years: historian

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel at 50 is less of a cohesive society than it was in its formative years, a Hebrew University historian said last week.

"The cohesiveness of the first years is gone," observed Idith Zertal at a Beth Tzedec Congregation lecture under the auspices of the New Israel Fund.

Fragmented by religious, social, cultural and political rifts, Israel today resembles "a loose federation of communities," some of which, haredim and Israeli Arabs, are alienated from the mainsteam.

Zertal described Israel as a country where different groups try to impose their beliefs and values upon each other.

"We're in the middle of a war," Zertal added, referring to the battle for Israel's future identity. "Will Israel be a liberal, secular, democratic state, or a regressive theocracy?"

Surveying Israel as it marks five decades of statehood, Zertal said it is still very much a "state in the making," a "porous and fragile society" without internal peace, a constitution or internationally recognized borders.

Nevertheless, Israel inspires love from many of its citizens, and life there is "very rewarding," she said.

Zertal's Hebrew University colleague, political scientist Shlomo Aronson, said that Israel is gripped by a malaise – a mid-life crisis – connected to Yitzhak Rabin's assassination and the Oslo peace process.

Rabin's murder deprived the nation of a strong and sincere leader who could rally most Israelis behind his decisions.

But neither Rabin nor his successor, Shimon Peres, anticipated the problems and difficulties of the peace process, particularly Islamic fundamentalist terrorism, said Aronson, currently a guest scholar at the Library of Congress in Washington.

Furthermore, Israelis had "simplistic expectations" of peace, believing it would lead to untrammeled peace and regional economic cooperation.

These expectations, he said, were totally exaggerated and unrealistic.

Neither were Israelis prepared for Egypt's reaction to the historic rapprochement between Israel and its Arab neighbors. Egypt – the preeminent Arab power and the first Arab state to sign a peace treaty with Israel – felt challenged by Israel's growing acceptance in the area.

Aronson also suggested that the Palestinians may not be satisfied with an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza Strip, but may press for a bi-national state, with a new flag, which would admit Palestinian refugees displaced by the 1948 war.

Turning to another topic, he claimed that there has been an erosion of support among the Israeli intelligentsia for Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state.

The lecture series, originally intended to take place at the Smithsonian Instutution in Washington, was shifted to Toronto following harsh criticism from right-wing Zionist circles in the United States.

It will continue on June 8 at Holy Blossom Temple with a lecture by Jerusalem Report columnist Stuart Schoffman.

Tour of hate

At a press conference in Damascus last week, the founder and spiritual leader of Hamas, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, predicted that Israel would be destroyed and a Palestinian state established during the first quarter of the next century. After meeting with Syrian officials and the heads of various radical Palestinian groups, he told reporters: "The strong will not remain strong forever and the weak will not remain weak forever."

Yassin was near the end of an eight-country tour of the Middle East and the Persian Gulf. He had left his home in Gaza ostensibly to obtain special medical treatment. But it soon became apparent that one of the key purposes of his trip, if not the key purpose, was to keep the malevolent Middle East cauldron of tribal-religious hatred insidiously simmering. Throughout his "tour," he frequently urged his co-religionists and fellow-travellers to bring about Israel's destruction.

Some commentators and pundits, of course, will dismiss these statements as merely more of the same rhetoric, the usual bombast, familiar flourishes of "sound and fury" that, in the end, signify nothing. But they are wrong.

By dismissing the sheikh's statements, they encourage them as well as the perverse, underlying attitudes that make such public pronouncements acceptable, and that makes hatred preferable to reconciliation, killing preferable to compromise and war preferable to coexistence.

The statements must be unreservedly condemned.

It was no coincidence, that, inspired by the sheikh's religious instruction, Hezbollah killed two Israeli soldiers, Yehudah Salem and Avraham Limoy, in south Lebanon. Two other soldiers were wounded.

At what point, can we expect such dark, medieval attitudes to be scorned by the leaders of the Middle East? Indeed, at what point can we expect these attitudes to be scorned by the politicians, commentators and pundits of the West, who in loud, demonstrative manner, often deride the policies of the government of Israel?

The sheikh's malign wishful thinking is, in truth, a prescription for prolonged Palestinian frustration and suffering. Moreover, and more revealing, he misunderstands Israel's real strength.

The source of Israel's strength is not its army; the army is the result of its strength. The source of Israel's strength is its determination to live and to build and to fulfil a divine plan for a good and decent society. In contrast, the unbending devotion to Israel's destruction consigns the sheikh and his followers to perpetual weakness.

Now, Nova Scotia

We commend the Legislature of Ontario for its endorsement last week of the Calgary declaration. That the vote was not unanimous, short only by one legislator, is merely a detail for the record. It does not diminish the force of the vote.

The declaration recognizes Quebec's unique character while affirming the equality of the provinces and of all Canadians. But because the separatist premier of Quebec, Lucien Bouchard, has stated repeatedly that he will never sit at the table to negotiate an improved federalism, the declaration and its ratifications by the legislatures of the country are directed over the heads of the Parti Québécois, directly to the hearts and minds of the people of Quebec. As Premier Mike Harris stated in his remarks prior to the vote, "the declaration is a very real signal to the people of Quebec that other Canadians are ready to recognize its unique identity."

Full-time beit din could not single-handedly solve agunah problem

Your article on beit din (CJN, May 14) quoted from my recent talk, but clarification is required.

I was misquoted with respect to the role of a standing beit din and the agunah problem: "Colman said he sees 'no reason' why the problem faced by agunot (women denied a Jewish divorce) could not be 'eradicated' by a full-time beit din in Toronto."

From my prepared text, I stated: "The beit din and its full-time administrator should assume comprehensive responsibility not only for dispute resolution but also for the administration of the ever-increasing gitten that unfortunately must be granted. Perhaps, a beit din with greater persuasive authority and a wider feeder system of lawyers, would be able, in some small way, to influence those who are reluctant to grant or receive their get. There is no legitimate reason why any member of the Jewish community should not be able to receive the full assistance and support of all elements of Jewish society so that the agunah problem can be eradicated. Of course, this matter is beyond the scope of this presentation. I note it here as I believe that as part of the suggested reform in our own system, we may have a window of opportunity to improve the agunah situation."

"Full assistance and support of all elements of Jewish society" involves wide-ranging measures. A standing beit din could not single-handedly eradicate the agunah problem.

The CJN article might imply that Colman does not appreciate the efforts of the devoted rabbanim. Rabbi Mordechai Ochs, av beit din on gitten matters, willingly facilitated special arrangements to secure a recalcitrant spouse's participation in the get process. Vaad Harabanim chair, Rabbi Moshe Stern, has improved beit din's accessibility. Several rabbanim, without adequate public recognition, serve as dayanim (judges) devoting endless hours. Most of them likely agree that room for improvement yet remains. Establishing a permanent rabbinical court will help to make Jewish justice more accessible and decrease the chilul HaShem of Jews litigating against Jews in secular courts.

Thanks Swiss for keeping him alive

Re: Dr. F. Mann's May 14 letter about Switzerland: My family is forever grateful to Switzerland for keeping me alive.

Yes, I will admit to being refused entry to Switzerland twice... but each time Swiss citizens with tears in their eyes came over to the truck that was to deport us back to France, to give us money, food and chocolate.

Please note that both times the Swiss driver waited to make sure the Vichy authorities were not around to arrest us.

On the third try, at the ripe old age of nine, with a 3-year-old in one hand, and a 6-year-old in the other, I managed to cross the Swiss border and finally we were all allowed to stay and survive.

The only money involved was to pay off my French compatriots to show us the way to the Swiss border.

Writing a book about an innovative Hebrew teacher

I am writing a biography of my father, Alexander Ziskind (Sigmund) Socol, who was a Hebrew teacher in Toronto for more than 50 years.

My father began teaching Hebrew in Toronto shortly after his arrival in 1911. By 1915, he and a friend had opened a private school on Augusta Avenue, Beys Seyfer T'khiya, The School of Revival, which was to be a modern, progressive cheder.

Unfortunately, the school didn't survive for very long. One blustery winter day a fierce wind blew the front door off its hinges, and the house quickly filled with snow. By the time they had finished shoveling all the snow from the classrooms, the aspiring young teachers realized that Jewish education would not be reborn in that flimsy structure.

In the early '20s my parents opened Socol's Hebrayishe-Yiddishe Shule at 71 Borden St., and over the course of about 25 years, hundreds of students passed through its doors.

The same ideals my father espoused in his youth remained with him throughout his teaching career, and he tried to combine traditional Jewish subjects with modern educational techniques.

In the mid-'40s my father closed our cheder and began teaching at the Brunswick Avenue Talmud Torah. In the '50s my parents moved northward to Joicey Boulevard, as my father joined the staff of Associated Hebrew Schools on Neptune Drive.

These are a few of my memories, but I would like to expand them through the reminiscences of my father's former pupils. Any stories, anecdotes, and impressions would be greatly appreciated.

The wonders in Israel's short history

A letter to the People of Israel.

On the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel I feel very proud and happy. What you have achieved is nothing short of a miracle. I am just an ordinary Jew, from Europe originally, and I have never experienced such wonders in any other nation's short history.

Thank God and the people of Israel.

May you have many more anniversaries in peace.

Prime Minister Netanyahu, after two years...

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Exactly two years ago, on May 29, 1996, prime ministerial hopeful Benjamin Netanyahu strode into Likud headquarters in Tel Aviv and told glum party activists not to give up hope because "it isn't over yet."

The gloom in the hall stemmed from television exit polls that predicted a thin victory for Shimon Peres. Netanyahu's appearance, alongside his truculent ally, David Levy, elicited pity.

"Admit defeat, man" was a sentiment someone must have voiced somewhere. Much of the country went to bed that night believing Peres had won, only to wake up in the morning and learn that Netanyahu had prevailed.

Those looking for a metaphor for Netanyahu's first two years in power need look no further than those topsy-turvy hours: Just when you think Netanyahu is through, he's back.

The first 24 months of the Netanyahu government have been punctuated by crisis after crisis: the Ariel Sharon appointment; the Western Wall Tunnel; the Hebron withdrawal; the Bar-On Affair; the Benny Begin resignation; Har Choma; the Dan Meridor resignation; the Khaled Meshal affair; the near putsch inside Likud; the Avigdor Lieberman resignation; the David Levy/Gesher breakaway; the tension with U.S. President Bill Clinton; and, of course, the ongoing crisis with the Palestinians over the Oslo Agreement.

After nearly each crisis, there has been talk by some, and hope among others, that any minute the curtain will fall on the prime minister. But it never does. Not only has Netanyahu remained in place, but his standing, judging by public opinion polls, is now stronger than ever.

After the bungled attempt to assassinate Meshal in September, Netanyahu was trailing Ehud Barak by 15 to 20 percentage points. Last week, a Yediot Achronot poll put the two neck and neck in a two-way race, with a number of other polls giving him a slight lead.

"From screw-up to screw-up," says Likud MK Meir Sheetrit, "his strength increases."

Were historians to stand in judgment of Netanyahu based on his first two years, said Bar-Ilan University lecturer Yehudit Auerbach, the conclusion would be decidedly negative.

But, she added, the Netanyahu years are very much a work still in progress.

"History judges men by results, and his immediate results are not positive," said Auerbach, who is working on a study about what she views as Netanyahu's ongoing war with the country's elite.

Among the immediate results she cites are steering the country into diplomatic isolation, an icy shoulder from the Arab world and galloping unemployment. "In every aspect, things today look bad, but much of the nation is giving him credit that we are on the way to something better," she said.

"Many people believe he can lead us to something better because, against all the odds and predictions, he has endured," Auerbach added.

Netanyahu has deliberately made the future a dominant theme in his rhetoric, says media consultant Benny Cohen, who served as media adviser to Yitzhak Rabin during 1994-95.

"The easiest way to escape from problems is to say I erred, but now will change," said Cohen. "If you notice, he always looks forward. All his speeches are full of words like, 'We will do; we will bring; we will build.'"

"If someone says, 'But wait a minute, you haven't done anything,' the reply is 'Ah, but I will.'"

Cohen is no historian, and he makes no bones about his dislike for Netanyahu. But, he says, Netanyahu is, to a large extent, achieving what he set out to do.

"There are two parameters by which one can judge how a person is doing his work: by the direction, and by the effectiveness," Cohen said. "I think Netanyahu is effective, but I think he is mistaken in the direction. If his direction was different, if he was the head of Labor and was interested in true peace, I'd say that's great."

That point of view is particularly telling, considering that much of the criticism of Netanyahu from left-wingers has been about what they say is an underlying anti-democratic political personality and a moral slipperiness.

"From my point of view, a leader is not a friend, he is an instrument of the state," Cohen said. "If I look at Netanyahu, Barak and Ronni Milo, they are instruments whose purpose, from my vantage point, is to ensure that my life will be better.

"What type of person they are, as long as they are not criminals, doesn't matter to me," Cohen added. "What I care about is that they give results."

Netanyahu – according to Cohen – has provided results for his constituents. "The man promised to stop Oslo and to renegotiate things with the Palestinians," Cohen said. "And everyone knew that renegotiation could lead to a halting of the process. In that regard, he is doing everything he set out to do.

"Understand that there is no one who wants to see him fall more than I," he continued. "But I am the last person who will say he did not understand that he embarked on a process that would lead to yelling and screaming and tension with the United States. He knows what he is doing, and he is doing it intentionally."

According to Cohen, Netanyahu has manoeuvered himself into a win-win situation. "If he is now tough with the Arabs and he is able to renegotiate Oslo at the price of some protests from the United States and the Europeans, he will say, 'See, I was right. We are able to get more in the negotiations.' But if the Arabs resume terrorism, he can also say, 'See, I was right. We can't make peace with them.'"

One man who thinks Netanyahu's approach will be vindicated is prominent conservative British historian Paul Johnson, the author of Modern Times: The World from the Twenties to the Eighties and A History of the Jews.

Johnson raised eyebrows last month when, in a Wall Street Journal opinion piece, he placed Netanyahu in the pantheon of Israel's great leaders, alongside David Ben-Gurion and Menachem Begin.

"I think he is doing a good job, but that his public relations are not good," said Johnson in a phone interview from his home in England. "But what he actually does is right. I believe he is right in not taking any risks."

Johnson, who sprinkles his conversation with reminiscences of encounters he had with Ben-Gurion and Begin, said Netanyahu is playing it safe with the Palestinians out of the fear that if he makes one serious mistake, "Israel has had it, and you will all be dead."

Johnson rejects the opposition's claim that not moving on Oslo constitutes a greater peril to Israel, since it will lead to an explosion with the Palestinians. "I don't think there is any real risk of war, unless Israel lowers its guard in a big way," Johnson said. "I don't think the Arabs are going to try something like that again.

"There is a risk of rioting and so on, but so what?" he added. "There has always been rioting in Palestine and Israel. It is something one has to put up with."

Netanyahu, Johnson predicted, will carry on with the peace process. "It is in the true interest of the Arabs to continue, and it is in the true interest of the Israelis to continue. And it will continue, but at a pace that is safe for Israel. I think Netanyahu, who has a background as a diplomat, understands this."

Johnson pointed out that the same things being said about Netanyahu were also said about Begin. "I remember people saying this man is impossible, an extremist and so forth, but he produced the first really important stage of the peace process. He made peace with Egypt. Begin was a very great man, and Netanyahu is in that tradition," Johnson said.

"Ben-Gurion was a tough character, Begin was a tough character, and Netanyahu is a tough character – and you have to have that," Johnson said. "Israel cannot afford to take the real big risk, and Netanyahu is not going to take it. I think he is right in not taking it.

"I have no doubt that in the fullness of time, and against the perspective of history, he will be seen as the great man and great leader that he is. That is my firm belief as a historian and as an observer of what is going on," said Johnson.

In contrast to Johnson, historian Shabtai Teveth, Ben-Gurion's biographer, said Netanyahu is taking risks that can can change the parameters of Oslo or bring about an explosion.

"There is no doubt that the person who gambles for high stakes, if he wins, ensures his place in history," said Teveth, who places himself among the prime minister's detractors. "In that regard, Netanyahu resembles those before him. The stakes are very high. If he succeeds in getting out of Oslo cheaply, not dividing Jerusalem, and if there are no attacks or tragedies, then that is impressive. But that is a delicate balancing act."

"Netanyahu is gambling," Teveth added, "but I don't think that he has the knowledge or the vision that is necessary. Ben-Gurion gambled on the basis of a tremendous understanding of history and of political events. He really was a man who could see the other side of the hill, very clearly and very accurately. That is how he proved his greatness.

"I don't think Netanyahu sees the other side of the hill. He hasn't proven that he does. There is no question that he gambles for big stakes. Until now, he has not convinced me that it is a calculated risk that he is taking, just a risk," said Teveth.

The gifts of the Jews

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

It's an awesome responsibility to have – the shaping of Western civilization. In his book, The Gifts of the Jews: How a Tribe of Desert Nomads Changed the Way Everyone Thinks and Feels, Thomas Cahill argues that the Jews did just that, by embodying a whole new way of regarding the universe and both humankind and God's place in it.

The book is a part of a series, The Hinges of History, that will describe what and how certain ideas shaped the western world, "a narration of how we became the people that we are and why we think and feel the way we do." His first book, How the Irish Saved Civilization, tells the story of how classical learning and Christianity were preserved in Irish monasteries and scriptoriums, and how their ideas were brought to Europe from Ireland.

His second credits the Jews with starting "it" all. "By 'it,'" he explains, "I mean so many of the things we care about, the underlying values that make all of us, Jew and gentile, believer and atheist, tick.

"Without the Jews... not only would our sensorium, the screen through which we receive the world, be different: we would think with a different mind, interpret all our experiences differently, draw different conclusions from the things that befall us."

According to Cahill, Jews were the inventors of Western thought, strong believers that there was a special destiny both for individuals and for nations. In fact, he argues, the Jews invented the concept of an individual destiny.

Having studied at the Jewish Theological Seminary as well as Union Theological Seminary, Cahill has taken the Jewish Bible and extracted the core ideas of western thought. It was Abraham who showed that an individual life can have meaning, that people could escape from the eccentric and whimsical fate decreed by the gods and from a cyclical view of humanity's destiny that regarded life as a wheel, repeating itself over and over. For the ancients, an individual's actions could not change anything, nor, other than through ritual and sacrifice, make contact with the divine. For Abraham and his descendants, life was a journey with countless possibilities for humanity and God to interact, argue and reconcile, thus making up the stuff of a history that valued the individual and charged the group, the nation, with a particular mission.

For Cahill, the "Sinai moment" was an event that charged the Israelites, themselves hardly out of slavery, with a heavy moral agenda. The Torah asserted a sense of justice and the sacredness of all human life. The Israelites would not accept the capriciousness of gods or the power of privilege. Justice had to be done, and the people huddled around the base of this anonymous mountain were the instrument that would preach such a gospel to those around them.

Of course, like every other human, individually and collectively, they failed over and over. Starting with the golden calf, there was always the tendency to hark back to the path of seeking gods rather than God, and of promoting bloodshed rather than justice. But the fact is that the Jews knew when they were doing it wrong and had a slew of prophets to remind them. And that made all the difference.

King David, who made the personal the universal and gave words to the individual in prayer, at the same time committed terrible sins for which he was punished. (I do have one quibble here – Cahill doesn't mention the first prayer in the Bible, Hannah's prayer in the Tabernacle, a model of personal supplication.) Throughout the period of the kings, prophets took on the role of the public conscience, right up until the destruction of the First Temple.

And it was in that destruction that the next great lesson was finally learned: the crucial thing was not the Temple or the state, but the ethics of the nation. What each person does is as important as what a king does; and kings are answerable both to God and to their people. All must be accountable for their deeds.

The Jews gave the world a sense of progress towards a goal rather than a sense of hopeless fate. And that journey, whether personal or national, had to be a pursuit of justice and law, equality and ethical behavior.

Cahill is not interested in proving the historicity of the Bible's stories.

The change in human relationships and a national sense of justice are the gift the Jews gave to the West.

Read the book. It will humble and exhilarate you.

From Generation To Generation

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I do not know which street in Toronto has the most automobile traffic, but I am probably not wrong if I assert that University Avenue is not only one of the busiest streets in the city, but also its most beautiful and stately boulevard. South of Queen's Park, it boasts a magnificent complex of hospitals. Among the many splendid buildings is one that stands out. Proudly displaying the name Mount Sinai Hospital, it speaks to the myriad of travellers in the city's Jewish community.

Many North American cities have Jewish hospitals, and often they belong to their city's finest institutions. This is true, in spades, for Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto. I was a patient there on several occasions, and uncounted times I have been a visitor performing the mitzvah of bikur cholim, visiting the sick. I was there when Queen Elizabeth inaugurated its present habitat; and for several years, I taught some courses to doctors and nurses on Jewish values traditions.

And now I have had the pleasure of reading a splendid book on the hospital's history. Written by Lesley Marrus Barsky, it is tellingly entitled From Generation To Generation. Enlivened with a panoply of pictures, it is above all a meticulously researched and well-written tale of an institution that rose from the humblest beginning to its present worldwide renown. Surprisingly, it was a group of dedicated women who brought about its birth. Ezras Noshem (as it was then called) became the motive power for the creation of a modest downtown hospital, a converted residence that soon burst its bonds. Then came the move to a fine new structure on University Avenue and the emergence – literally speaking – of the community into the limelight of Toronto. A third building that is the locus for Mount Sinai today has become part of the Toronto hospital complex.

What impressed me particularly in the book was the author's ability to tell her story engagingly and to deal with a multitude of persons adequately, yet without making it a boring recital of faces and facts.

In a way, From Generation To Generation is the history of Toronto's Jewry, and longtime residents will here meet old friends and relive their own past, while newcomers will find out an essential aspect of a community they now call their own.

Barsky does not shy away from discussing the controversy that embroiled Mount Sinai in its relation to the provincial budgetary cuts and amalgamation plans. Thus the author ends her book on a reflective note: "It is certain that the long tradition of optimism and determination that once drove the rugged individuals who began Mount Sinai Hospital, will not soon be dispatched to the dustbin of history. Both within the hospital and outside in the Canadian community it serves, the irrepressible will for Mount Sinai to prosper and flourish, grounded in a single core value of uncompromising excellence, remains as substantial and durable as those sturdy Yorkville tables and chairs" in its first location.

Singin' in the (Berditchev) rain

By Shel Krakofsky in London

Needed some cheering up the other day. Took a quick stroll downtown. It was dark and raining. Went looking for Gene Kelly kicking up water and twirling around a lamppost.

No such luck. People don't spin around lampposts in the rain any more. Maybe that's what's wrong. It's not the history. It's the choreography.

If I couldn't sing and dance with Gene Kelly, I could at least go home and read about his chassidic equivalent (a stretch?), Levi-Yitzchak of Berditchev. The stories of Levi-Yitzchak, though never forgotten, have been made more popular this century through and in the writings of Martin Buber and Elie Wiesel.

Buber correctly describes chassidic tales as "a world of legendary reality." The transmitted stories cannot be authenticated with any degree of certainty, yet they accurately reflect the passionate fervor and exalted joy of the masters and their chassidic followers. With unbridled enthusiasm, they affirmed the quotidian union of the natural and the Divine.

Levi-Yitzchak said: "Whether someone really loves God can be determined by the love he bears toward human beings."

Only the outlines of the actual life of Levi-Yitzchak (1740-1809) are known. Born in Galicia, he was a talmudic prodigy who studied Chassidism with the Maggid of Mezritch, who had studied with the Baal Shem Tov. Levi-Yitzchak learned with the Maggid that a Jewish life must be lived as well as studied.

He defended his community before God, even when its members were involved with wrong-doing. Once the rabbi of Berditchev saw a man attired for Shacharit services with prayer shawl and tfillin, greasing the wheels of his wagon.

"Lord of the world," exclaimed Levi-Yitzchak. "Behold this man. Behold the devoutness of Your people. Even as they grease the wheels of a wagon, they are still mindful of Your Name!"

Even as he defended his people, he could bristle against them. When Levi-Yitzchak discovered that the young women of Berditchev worked continuously from early morning until late at night kneading the dough and baking matzah for Passover, he mourned their drudgery from the pulpit. He cried aloud, "Those who hate Israel accuse us of baking matzah with the blood of Christians. But no, we bake matzah with the blood of Jews!"

It has been said of Levi-Yitzchak that he loved God, he loved Torah but above all, he loved the people of Israel. He was a man of the people who revered the ordinary while intimately praising the Almighty, possessing the temerity to confront Him with threats and sarcasm. With Abraham, Moses and Job, for example, there were dialogues with God. Levi-Yitzchak was different. He insisted on answers and even threatened his Judge.

This rebbe was comfortable reminding God – even on Yom Kippur – that He too must ask forgiveness for the inflictions He had visited on His children. The request for pardon had to be reciprocal. Once he remained standing at his pulpit all day without uttering a sound. He had warned God, "If You refuse to answer our prayers, I shall refuse to go on saying them."

Levi-Yitzchak tried hard to be above rivalries. His faith in God and man was too genuine for him to sanction differences and intolerance. One day, the wife of a militant Mitnagid threw garbage on the head of Levi-Yitzchak. Without responding, he continued his walk to synagogue.

"Don't be angry with her Lord," he prayed. "It's not her fault. Poor woman, she wishes only to please her husband. Can You blame her for that?"

For Levi-Yitzchak, one could be a Jew with God or even against God – but not without God. Once he vented his anger and frustrations, he always came back. One Passover, he compared himself to the one who does not know how to ask. "Ah, it is not why I suffer that I wish to know, but only whether I suffer for Your sake."

Levi-Yitzchak still remains sui generis, someone who by his example can help us to accept each other and that which we will never understand.

Or, as my wife Dalia (who is not from Berditchev) likes to remind me, better to sing in the rain than to curse in the sun.

The Kirshner File

The legendary Morris (Two-Gun) Cohen

Morris (Two-Gun) Cohen was one of the most picaresque characters of this century. An adventurer, soldier of

By Sheldon Kirshner

Born in 1888 in Poland, and raised in London, he was the eldest son of Orthodox Jewish parents. An incorrigible juvenile delinquent who drifted into crime, this ne'er-do- well was, in the fashion of the day, packed off to Canada as a last resort.

Wandering into a Chinese gambling den in Saskatoon to play a hand of poker, Cohen came to the defence of a Chinese man during an armed robbery. This impulsive act earned him the gratitude and friendship of the local Chinese community, as well as an enduring footnote in Chinese politics.

Sailing to China in 1922, Cohen wormed his way into the entourage of president Sun Yat-sen, the father of modern China. Cohen was appointed as his bodyguard, and in the interval between the fall of the Manchu Empire and the Japanese invasion of China, he was given a generalship in the Chinese Nationalist army.

Interned in Hong Kong by Japan during World War II, Cohen returned to Canada, where he was feted as a hero. Settling in Montreal, he was by turns an antique dealer, an arms procurer for the Irgun and a lobbyist for a Canadian airline seeking a route to China.

A shameless self-promoter, Cohen was rarely out of the limelight. Exotic and flamboyant, he was an irresistible subject for any reporter looking for a colorful story. But Cohen tended to embellish his credentials, and he incorporated these outlandish claims into his memoirs.

Twenty-eight years after his death, Daniel Levy has written what may be Cohen's definitive biography. Levy, in Two-Gun Cohen (St. Martin's Press), sweeps away the myths and draws a balanced and realistic picture of his subject. As Cohen emerges from the pages of this masterfully-researched book, he comes across as an endearing, though flawed, personality.

Nicknamed Fat Moisha when he was an amateur boxer, Cohen was a brawler and a pickpocket in his youth. A product of the mean streets of London's East End, which generated a bumper crop of petty criminals, Cohen fell in with a notorious shill known as Harry the Gonof. Distraught by their wayward son's predilections, the Cohens enrolled him in a reform school. Before long, he was on a ship heading to Canada. Arriving in Quebec in 1905, he proceeded to Manitoba.

Starting out as a farm laborer, Cohen was soon a circus barker in Saskatchewan. Tiring of this, he sold fake jewelry and pimped for a bawdy house. Charged with carnal knowledge of a girl under 16, he was arrested, tried and imprisoned for nearly six months. Tasting freedom once more, he turned to pickpocketing.

Cohen's downward spiral might have continued apace had he not walked into the middle of a robbery in a gambling parlor in 1909. Coming to the rescue of a Chinese patron whose diamond ring a thief had pulled off his finger, Cohen socked the miscreant on the jaw, then relieved him of his ill-gotten gains.

It was a watershed in Cohen's life. Cohen made the acquaintance of the person he had helped and he, in turn, introduced him to the Chinese Nationalist League. Some years would pass before he used this connection to his benefit. But after being demobilized from wartime service as a soldier in the Canadian army during World War I, Cohen resumed contact with the Chinese Nationalist League, and subsequently, joined Sun Yat-sen as a bodyguard.

China, in the 1920s, was convulsed by civil war, and Cohen thrived in this turmoil. After being wounded in a skirmish, he packed two pistols on his hip, and this obsession with security spawned his sobriquet, Two-Gun Cohen.

He remained in China after the death of his patron, Sun Yat-sen, in 1925, and when a Japanese expeditionary army invaded the country in 1937, he assisted in directing the war effort. Cohen also served the Nationalist cause as an arms merchant, and it was a profitable sideline.

By Levy's reckoning, Cohen was not an important force in China. He deliberately left that impression with Western foreign correspondents. In practice, Cohen was a relatively minor functionary. Whatever his position in the hierarchy, Cohen was genuinely loyal to his masters, never failing to tell listeners that China was "the only country in the world that has not... persecuted the Jews."

In 1942, Cohen's relatives in Britain read a newspaper report that he had been executed by the Japanese at the express wish of Adolf Hitler. In fact, he had been interned. Released from captivity in 1943, Cohen went back to Canada. And at a dinner in Montreal organized on his behalf by the Jewish community, Cohen was praised to the heavens by Samuel Bronfman, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

In Montreal, Cohen met, and married, a divorcee named Ida Judith Clark. Her brother, Gerald, would go on to be editor of the now-defunct Montreal Star.

Cohen had a legion of admirers in the local Chinese community, but he was never able to earn a decent living in Montreal. Levy claims that he lived off his wife's income. She owned a fancy dress shop next to the Ritz-Carlton Hotel. Eventually, they split up.

Morris (Two-Gun) Cohen

Despite his straitened circumstances, Cohen cut a debonair figure around town, and was on a first-name basis with Saul Hayes, director of the Canadian Jewish Congress. Hayes, we're told, convinced Cohen to persuade the Chinese Nationalist delegation in the United States to support the political rights of the Jews in Palestine.

Cohen returned to China in 1946, amid fierce battles pitting the Nationalists against the Communists. To his dismay, he discovered that his influence had waned.

Nevertheless, Cohen was sufficiently influential that he was able to acquire Chinese small arms for the Irgun, the Zionist Revisionist militia in Palestine. And during this period, as a self-professed "national-minded Jew," he attempted to open the Chinese market to Jewish-manufactured goods from Palestine.

Always alert to potential business opportunities, Cohen used his clout with the Chinese Nationalist leader, Chiang Kai-Shek, to acquire a route for Canadian Pacific Airways from Vancouver to Shanghai.

In 1952, Cohen moved permanently to Britain, but his attempts at being an entrepreneur failed. His memoir, published two years later, did not improve his prospects.

Until the mid-1950s, Cohen was a vociferous opponent of the Communist government in China. But bowing to reality, he made his peace with the regime and, ultimately, Cohen was accepted as a friend by both the Communists and the Nationalists.

In his final years, Cohen was often seen in the company of Western reporters and businessmen in Beijing. He was widely regarded as a name-dropper and luftmentsch, but appearances could be deceiving.

He landed work as a consultant for Rolls-Royce. And, at the request of Israel's foreign minister, Golda Meir, he did what he could to foster friendly Chinese ties with Israel. Cohen, however, did not live long enough to see the fruit of his labor. More than two decades would elapse before Israel and China established official diplomatic relations in January 1992.

Power of the mitzvah

By
RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN

There is an insightful midrash recorded in the Talmud (Shabbat 88, A) which tells us that when the Israelites gave precedence to "we will do" over "we will understand," 600,000 ministering angels came and placed two crowns upon each man of Israel, one as a reward for "we will do" and the other as a reward for "we will understand."

Apparently, the Jews were rewarded not only for agreeing to observe and understand the Torah, but also for the order and precedence in which they accepted it: First, committing themselves to observance, and then to understanding.

Although the logical order should have been understanding the reason for the commandments and then observing, our ancestors chose first to observe. Why should they choose such an extreme irrational approach?

I believe that this action-oriented approach of our ancestors came from their keen understanding of religion and God and not primitive extremism. They knew that it was impossible to comprehend a set of rules and commandments about to be given by an infinite and transcendent God. They realized that the only way to apprehend this infinite God was by actually observing his commandments. Observance, they felt, was the vehicle to approaching God. Accepting God on his terms, as demonstrated by our actions, was the only way to touch the Divine. Of course, they were prepared to understand whatever was humanly possible as they said "and we will understand." But, only after their commitment to "we will observe."

Thus, giving precedence to action over logic was not a weakness on our ancestors' behalf. It was a result of their understanding of God and the limitations of the human mind. This is why the angels rewarded the Jews for giving their precedence to "we will do."

In recent years, we too have seen the benefits of this approach. Over the last few decades, we have witnessed a major revolution in the Jewish community, especially amongst the youth. Thousands have returned to the traditional observances accepted by our ancestors at Mount Sinai. This renaissance, by the way, rejects all the "doom and gloom" forecasters who point to the rising trends of intermarriage and assimilation, and who predict a gradual demise of the Jewish people. These young people have brought feelings of renewal and hope to the entire Jewish community and are the living proof that Judaism will survive.

In a recent survey conducted by one of the major Israeli newspapers, it was pointed out that the first contact for most was not a seminar or Torah class, but rather the observance of a mitzvah either through an experience at the Kotel or an encounter with a mitzvah tank (putting on the tfillin or lighting Shabbat candles). Clearly the first experience that ignited the Jewish soul within them was an action-oriented mitzvah. Of course, this experience was followed by the necessary Torah study to fill the minds of these young people with the knowledge needed. Yet, the pattern has statistically been the first fulfilment of a mitzvah, and only afterwards Torah study.

Apparently, the power of the mitzvah has not changed over the thousands of years and our ancestors' choice of "we will do and then understand," is truly the secret of Jewish survival.

The world of Jewish software

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

There are limits to the Internet. There, I said it.

Although the Internet holds an incredible wealth of Jewish information and allows worldwide dialogue that was previously impossible, there are many computing tasks you just can't do on the Web. You need software. But Jewish software is so specialized, you are probably not going to find it at your local high-tech megastore. And unless you live near a very good Judaica store, you could be out of luck.

Still, thanks to the Internet, anyone anywhere can track down that perfect piece of software with just a few taps of the keyboard. And the on-line selection is amazing: everything from full-featured bilingual bi-directional word processors [http://www.kabsoft.com/wp.htm] to searchable Torah, Talmud and Jewish encyclopedias on CD-ROM [http://www.jewishsource.com/software/index.html] to a Hebrew tutorial program that includes on-screen finger spelling for the deaf [http://www.radix.net/~dor_l_dor/jewish_deaf.html].

And best of all, there's a lot of free stuff out there.

Over the next weeks, I'll take you to the most interesting commercial and free Jewish software sites. We'll take a look at the incredible work being done by both large and small Jewish software developers and I'll give you some tips for buying on line.

First a few disclaimers. I could never possibly test all the software I will mention in these columns; that alone could be a full-time occupation. Although I hope to point you in the direction of some of the best software out there, please do not interpret a mention of software as a recommendation. Also, please excuse me if I do not mention your favorite program or software site.

A few more important points:

• Do your research. The Jewish Computing Review is a wonderful resource which has already investigated Talmud and Bible software, Hebrew and archeology programs and phone and calendar applications [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Index.asp?ColumnID=61]. These articles are very informative. Unfortunately, no new ones have appeared lately.

• Shop around for the best deal. One of the great things about the Internet is that you can save money right at your keyboard if you shop around. The Artscroll Stone Chumash CD-ROM lists for $139 (US). At Sapphire Software [http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/Ruben_at_Sapphire_Software/sapphire.htm], it goes for $95 (US). Over at Torah Educational Software [http://www.jewishsoftware.com/], it's on special for $59.00. For more on-line catalogues, see also The Source for Everything Jewish [http://www.jewishsource.com/software/softwr02.html] and the ComStar company [http://www.gy.com/www/he.htm].

• Read the fine print. Make sure the software is compatible with your computer. Many companies will not accept returned software unless it is defective. Don't get stuck with something your computer can't handle.

• Be cautious about giving your credit card information on line. Many sites will provide you with an encrypted order form for extra security. Or simply fax or phone your order in.

• Be safe. Most of the sites which we'll visit seem respectable. However, prudent Internet surfers know that downloaded software should be tested with a reliable anti-virus program.

• Be honest. Shareware developers rely on your good will. Many software companies allow you to download their programs to try them out. If you like it and use it, pay for it.

Do you have a favorite Jewish program? Have you bought Jewish software on line? What was it like for you? I'd like to hear about your experience; so write me at the address below.

Next week, we'll continue our on-line shopping spree.

Celebrating Shavuot

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The holiday of Shavuot involves the celebration of Israel's receiving the Torah. One could ask whether we are merely commemorating a past event or whether there is a significance to the holiday that surpasses history.

The midrash states that when Israel accepted the Torah with the words "we will do and we will understand," the angels became active. According to this midrash, an angel came down for each Israelite and tied two crowns upon their heads. Each person bears these crowns for as long as they continue to fulfil the Torah. It seems that the midrash speaks of a reward that the angels bestow on Israel. Perhaps it signifies Israel's elevated status from commoner to royalty. However, read in light of another midrash the crowns upon our heads gain tremendous significance.

A second midrash describes Moses observing God as the Torah is being written. This midrash states that Moses sees God tying the crowns onto the letters within the Torah. The letters within a scroll of Torah are written with crowns upon them and it is these crowns that Moses observes. Moses asks God why the crowns are being applied and God responds that in the future, a man will emerge who will interpret myriads of laws from each and every letter.

Moses asks to see this man and immediately finds himself in the back of Rabbi Akivah's academy. There is an argument taking place and Moses cannot follow the particulars of the dispute. He becomes disoriented until he hears a student ask Rabbi Akivah where this law originates. When Rabbi Akivah responds that it is the law given to Moses at Sinai, Moses is comforted.

This midrash speaks of Torah and its interpretation. God tells Moses that the written Torah is contained within the letters of the scroll, but so are the interpretations. The nuances, philosophies and interpretations are embodied within the crowns that God is tying to each letter.

The interpretations that Moses hears in the academy are upsetting to him until he hears that even these interpretations originate within the text. Each interpretation finds its place in a common source and is always traceable back to the text.

The parallel between the two midrashim allows the second to enrich the first. All Israelites bear the crowns upon their heads. Each Jewish person becomes a letter of the Torah. Our individual understandings and interpretations are embodied within our crowns; yet all that is granted is potential. A letter is meaningless unless it can combine with others to make a word. Words are limited unless they can combine with others to make a sentence.

When we join together in our study and our enactment of Torah, we form the words of the scroll itself. Yet it is only potential, for we must always ask. Have we formed a word or are we forming gibberish? The process can only take place if we open dialogues and share our crowns.

On Shavuot we not only celebrate the historical event of receiving the Torah, but we must realize that we ourselves can become a living Torah.

A question of two rights

By SIMON ROSENBLUM

Last year was the 100th anniversary of the Zionist movement. A few years ago, the celebrated Zionist statesman Abba Eban was speaking in Toronto and he referred to the two great moments in Zionist history. The first was obviously the signing of Israel's Declaration of Independence. The second, he said, was the 1993 Washington signing by Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat of the Israel-Palestinian Declaration of Principles.

Such a viewpoint was very much in accord with the fundamentals of Zionism. The great Chaim Weizmann, for example, said the problem of Palestine was that it was not a question of right and wrong; it was a question of two rights, of two nationalisms, those of the Arabs and those of the Jews. Such questions, he argued, could only be resolved by untidy compromises, not by rigid formulas.

Indeed, modern mainstream Zionism from David Ben-Gurion to Rabin and Shimon Peres followed a basic premise – that the security of Israel would only be assured through a wise combination of self-defence, diplomacy and efforts to seek accommodation with Israel's neighbors, i.e., the partition of the land.

To quote Abba Eban again: "In my successful plea for Israel's United Nations admission on May 5, 1949, I said that 'at every stage of Israel's relations with the Arab world, we have found equality of status to be the essential condition of partnership.' In these conditions, [Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu's constant assertion of hostility to Palestinian statehood sets him apart from a growing Israeli consensus and constitutes a major obstacle to regional peace."

Moving on to the 1980s, we saw the emergence of a majority of Israeli generals and senior intelligence officers who, for a variety of reasons, understood that peace based on major territorial compromise is Israel's best security option. Their reasoning incorporated an appreciation of an unfolding moderation in important parts of the Arab world with the understanding that in an era of missiles, the security threat to Israel was changing, and finally a strong feeling that Israel should not be permanent occupiers.

Today about two-thirds of Israelis – with varying degrees of enthusiasm – acknowledge (in public opinion surveys) that if there is to be a meaningful peace, approximately 90 percent of the West Bank will have to be returned to the Palestinians, and that Palestinians living in Arab east Jerusalem will have to have some form of identity with the emerging Palestinian state. Israelis, understandably, will only pursue such a generous peace if they believe the other side is serious.

Arafat is, to be sure, a difficult peace partner, and Israel needs to make sure the Palestinian Authority follows through on its security responsibilities. Netanyahu is right to stress reciprocity; he is wrong to make it a smokescreen to hide behind.

Last fall, a Ma'ariv editorial talked of the three no's of the Netanyahu government: no to a Palestinian state, no to a retreat on settlements and no to any compromise on Jerusalem. The result, they concluded, is simply no chance for the peace process.

Netanyahu fiercely clings to the position that at best, the Palestinians will recover 50 percent of the West Bank and that whatever this Palestinian entity would be called, it would be broken up by Israeli settlements throughout.

Again we quote Ma'ariv, a centrist Israeli newspaper, in an editorial saying that the final status plans of the Netanyahu government are a "sandwich which no one can swallow and would make Bosnia look like a Garden of Eden."

Currently the efforts of the Netanyahu government to put off the next stage of Israeli redeployment from the West Bank well into the latter part of this year and to minimize its scope have been roundly criticized as evasive tactics. Little good can come of this.

Israel's chance for a secure peace is being sabotaged and could be lost for a generation. That is not the Zionism of Ben-Gurion and Rabin.

Another Zionist veteran, David Kimche, who was a former director of the Israeli Foreign Ministry, has recently argued in this vein and provides an appropriate conclusion to this piece: "Peace can be fashioned in a manner that will uphold our security, but security without peace is nonexistent. The circumstances today are such that enable us to reach that goal. If our government fails to exploit these circumstances, it will bring tragedy to our people. In generations to come, our children and grandchildren will bemoan the fact that because of a bad government, Israel missed the chance of obtaining one of its most important goals, peace with our neighbors and security. We must not allow that to happen."

25 teenagers receive Bronfman Youth Fellowships

TORONTO — Shoshanna Lockshin, daughter of Prof. Martin and Ruth Lockshin, is among 25 teenagers in the United States and Canada named to receive 1998 Bronfman Youth Fellowships under a program designed to develop future community leaders committed to the concept of Jewish unity.

Shoshanna Lockshin

This summer, Lockshin will spend five weeks in Israel with the Youth Fellowships program launched 12 years ago by Edgar Bronfman, chair of the Seagram Company Ltd. and president of the World Jewish Congress.

The 26 fellows – chosen from over 350 applicants – were selected on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the standard of selection for this fully funded fellowship award.

Lockshin, a Grade 11 student at Ulpanat Orot high school was among her school's delegation to the Model UN run by Yeshiva University, where she received a special mention for her political contribution. Active in the Grade 11 production of Free to Be... You and Me, she also competed in the national level of Chidon HaTanach (Bible Contest) in Ottawa.

Head of the Bnei Akiva chapter at Kehillat Shaarei Torah and counsellor for grades 7 and 8 at Congregation B'nai Torah, Lockshin is also active in YACHAD, an organization for developmentally delayed young adults. In addition, she has won awards for outstanding service at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and at the Hospital for Sick Children where she volunteers.

The 26 Bronfman Fellows for 1998 consist of 14 girls and 12 boys. The group will fly to Israel on July 7, following an orientation seminar in New York City, and will return to the United States on Aug. 12.

They will spend five weeks in Israel in a program of intensive study, travel and dialogue with members of the educational staff of the Bronfman Fellowship program, as well as with prominent political and literary figures, representing a broad spectrum of views on key political, social and religious issues facing world Jewry.

This year, for the first time, The Samuel Bronfman Foundation has created a parallel group of young Israeli high school students, called Amitei Bronfman. This was done in cooperation with Mifgashim, a program of Charles Bronfman's CRB Foundation which for the past four years has been creating joint educational programming for Israeli and Diaspora youth.

The Israeli fellows, who, like their American counterparts were chosen after a rigorous selection process and represent a cross section of contemporary Israel society, will have their own educational programming as well as a week-long encounter with the American fellows.

Aliyah of Russian Jews expected to increase

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Aliyah of Russian Jews to Israel has decreased recently because of the political situation in Israel but in the long run it will increase again.

This is the view of Vitally Pruss, director of the Aish HaTorah program in Minsk, capital of Belarus.

"Some Jews are hopeful that their earnings will be good in a stable economy [in Russia], but it is an illusion," he said. "Anti-Semitism is pretty strong and may fall down on Jewish heads at any time.

"Today the [Russian] government allows us to operate but nobody knows what will happen tomorrow."

Pruss, who heads up a college in Minsk, is one of an Aish Hatorah team that oversees a program of awakening Jewish roots in 65,000 people in the former Soviet Union and in Israel. He said there are still 1.5 million Jews in the former Soviet Union.

On a brief visit to Toronto with Rabbi Shalom Schwartz, formerly of Toronto, Aish Hatorah director in Jerusalem, Pruss said the program's objective is "saving Jewish souls."

Born in Minsk 23 years ago, Pruss said he knew nothing about his Jewish background until he made contact with Aish Hatorah about five years ago.

Though Minsk had 150,000 Jews pre-war and more than 100 synagogues, it now has only three synagogues with regular services on Shabbat. However, Pruss said, Aish Hatorah is able to reach one-quarter of the 40,000 Jews now in Minsk, through its internal and outreach programs.

Rabbi Schwartz and Pruss paid a visit to Leslie and Anna Dan who are helping to finance a free all-day Aish HaTorah Discovery program in Russian at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, June 7. The co-sponsor is the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society. It will be led by Dr. Efin Svirsky, an Israeli psychiatrist.

For registration in the June 7 program, call 636-2316.

Community Matters

First Step for Ne'eman Proposals

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto President Joseph Steiner sees the first meeting of Israel's new conversion institute as a "good first step." The new body, officially known as the Institute for Jewish Studies, was proposed by Israel's Ne'eman Commission which examined ways to resolve the controversy surrounding religious conversions.

The new Institute, under the auspices of the Jewish Agency, funded by North American UJA Federations, would involve Reform, Conservative, and Orthodox representatives in preparing people for conversions. The conversions themselves would be carried out by the Chief Rabbinate.

The Ne'eman report won widespread support from the Knesset although the Chief Rabbinate has yet to fully endorse it. The government of Israel and the Jewish Agency are moving swiftly to implement the proposals of the Commission headed by Israeli Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman.

The UJA Federation system has played a major role in promoting the Ne'eman Commission's efforts and Steiner is now cautiously optimistic about the future.

"We are glad the meeting took place but much work is left to be done if the contents of the Ne'eman report are to be carried out fully."

Joseph Steiner

Committee Cultivates Communication

The Advisory Committee is fostering the kind of dialogue exemplified by this UJA Federation youth symposium.

Leaders of Toronto's Conservative, Reform and Orthodox movements have begun a new dialogue on behalf of community unity.

The Denominational Advisory Committee to the President of UJA Federation, which meets regularly to discuss cross denominational issues, was created to deal with sentiments arising from the proposed conversion legislation in Israel which the Knesset did not pass. The objective of the committee is to facilitate and expand communication between all streams on issues relating to unity.

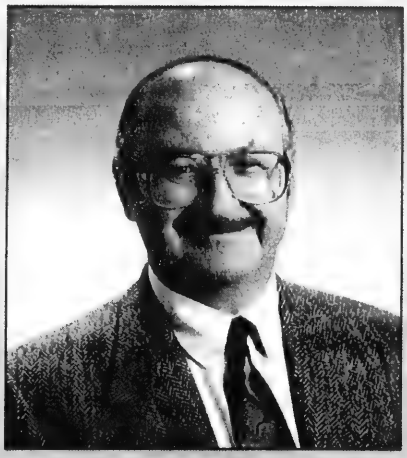
"Our mission is to keep our community on an even keel and to work together toward the common good," explains Kurt Rothschild, National President of the Canadian Zionist Federation and World Chairman of Mizrachi. "Irrespective of our differences, as a Jewish people we have a lot in common."

"The Advisory Committee provides a much needed forum in which potentially volatile denominational issues can be diffused before they reach a critical stage," adds Norm Stern, President of Mercaz Canada. "It's the only way to avoid mud slinging and remain focused on the good of the community."

"We must protect the feeling of Klal Israel in our community," maintains Art Benjamin, President of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism. "We must turn walls into windows of opportunity."

The Committee is also helping to plan the itinerary for a visit by a Knesset delegation scheduled for next fall. Knesset members, under the auspices of UJA Federations across North America, have been visiting communities to hear Diaspora views on Jewish unity.

Yiddish for Youth



Getting more children and teenagers interested in Yiddish is one of the objectives of the new director of UJA Federation's Committee for Yiddish, Adam Fuerstenberg. He is an expert in Canadian Jewish and Yiddish literature, who studied with well-known Yiddish folklorist Dov Noy and legendary Yiddish scholar Dov Sadan. Fuerstenberg begins his new position as he retires from a 34 year teaching career at Ryerson Polytechnic University's English department. Fuerstenberg is also the editor of Parchment, Canada's only journal of Jewish creative writing.

These Israeli teenagers symbolize the kind of harmony for which the Ne'eman Commission is striving.

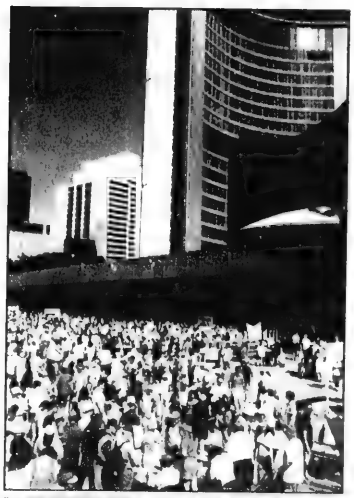
Community Matters

WOW! WHAT A TURNOUT!



Never before have so many members of Toronto's Jewish community turned out for one event. More than 15,000 Israel 50 Fun Walkers and Festival goers filled the streets of downtown Toronto last week. The 1998 UJA Federation Israel 50 Fun Walk from Nathan Phillips Square to Ontario Place raised more than $200,000 for Jews in need." It was a spectacular celebration of Israel's 50th," said Jeff Cohen, who co-chaired the Walk with Fran Grundman and Corey Mandell. "What a thrill to see so many members of our community step together for Israel."

ON TO THE FABULOUS FESTIVAL

After the Walk thousands gathered at Ontario Place to continue Israel at 50 celebrations which featured live entertainment on three different stages, including a choir of 1200 Jewish day school students, an Israeli marketplace and a camel at the entrance to the park. The Israel at 50 Festival was co-chaired by Tillie Margolis and Ray Rubin.

Ezrath Nashim fundraiser is a real laugh-fest

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — More than 350 people who love a good laugh crowded into the Leah Posluns Theatre recently for an evening of comedy presented by the Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital.

They were treated to the comic antics of six stand-up comedians with proceeds from the show going to support Alzheimer research at the Jerusalem-based medical facility.

The show was very well received while as much as $5,000 was raised for Ezrath Nashim, said Jeff Toledano, executive director of the Canadian Friends. The program was geared to attract people in the 25-40 age demographic and "raise the profile of the organization," he said.

The program, which featured comedians Lou Eisen, Lawrence Morgenstern, Les Aaron, Steve Brinder, Greg Eckler and Stewart Silver, was a first for the Friends' group. The organization's main fundraising event is its annual concert, which this year is scheduled for Sept. 13 at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts. This year's concert will honor Dr. Stanley Greben, founding chief of psychiatry at Mount Sinai Hospital.

A special guest at the comedy show was Yehezkel Caine, director-general of Ezrath Nashim in Israel. Caine was lavish with his praise for the hospital's supporters in Toronto. "Toronto has had a very marked impact on the hospital. It has one of the bigger donor groups, more than in most American cities," he said.

A rehabilitation pavilion at the hospital was rebuilt with the financial help of Nathan and Lily Silver and Sydney and Florence Cooper. Ezrath Nashim shares an endowment with Mount Sinai Hospital that was established by Albert and Temmy Latner. The endowment funds research into social psychiatry, focusing on stress-related issues suffered by Holocaust survivors as well as by war and bombing victims, he said.

"We've developed quite an expertise in coping with stress and stress-related disorders," Caine said.

With 330 beds, Ezrath Nashim is the third largest hospital in Jerusalem. The medical facility has three main divisions, Caine explained.

The geriatric division focuses on acute care medicine and physical rehabilitation. Doctors in the psychiatry division address stress-related issues and practice "regular psychiatry" while the hospital's third division focuses on "neurogeriatrics," addressing Parkinson's disease, Alzheimer disease and other dementia, Caine said.

Caine's Canadian itinerary included a trip to Montreal, where he met with the Friends' national board, and a visit to Vancouver to establish professional contacts and discuss research projects involving the University of British Columbia. In addition, he met with members of the Jewish community to examine creation of a friends group on the west coast.

Caine, who was a helicopter pilot in the Israeli air force for more than 20 years and later served as surgeon-general of the air force for 3½ years, said that between six and nine percent of Ezrath Nashim's annual operating budget is raised philanthropically around the world. There are Friends' groups in the United States, Britain, France, Holland, South Africa, Canada and Israel.

Funds raised in Canada "go almost completely to research and education," he added.

Relief far off for survivors

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A proposal to raise the maximum income levels under which Holocaust survivors of "advanced age" can get payments from the hardship fund is still subject to the agreement of the German government, said Kurt Herzstein, a caseworker with the United Restitution Organization of Toronto.

After hearing that the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany has negotiated a change in the income levels for these survivors subject to the German government's agreement, Herzstein said, it "brings no immediate relief for aging survivors.

A definition of the advanced age criterion is also subject to the agreement of the German government, according to a press release from the claims conference.

The change negotiated would eliminate social security payments in tallying the incomes of survivors.

In Canada, this would mean deducting any payments under Old Age Security and the Canada Pension Plan. Prior to this, the maximum levels were $21,000 (Cdn) for a single person and $30,000 (Cdn) for a couple.

"Basically I'm glad that they [the German government] have unhitched one notch on the belt," Herzstein said.

But he pointed out that the change is also subject to the approval of the governing bodies of the claims conference.

"Any reason for rejoicing is premature," Herzstein said.

Tensions flare in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Police have intervened to defuse escalating tensions between Lubavitch students and members of a Christian messianic group, which proselytizes among recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union living in Cote des Neiges.

Since January, the students have stepped up their attempts to dissuade Russian Jews from going to services at the House of David, which rents space at the Bethlehem Healing Fountain, a storefront church on Decarie Boulevard, near Bourret Street, owned by a Pentecostal congregation.

The messianic group is led by a converted Russian Jewish pastor, Gennady Livshits, who came here from Edmonton one year ago.

Livshits said between 20 and 40 Lubavitchers, aged anywhere from 14 to 25, regularly show up on Friday evenings, when the messianics meet. "They stand on the sidewalk very close to the door and scream and cry as people come in. They use all kinds of manipulation and intimidation to try to stop them from entering. Sometimes, it's of a physical nature."

They first showed up when the House of David had its first meeting a year ago, he said.

The demonstrators, who come from the Rabbinical College on Westbury Avenue, have been showing up more frequently in the last few weeks, and police have had to be called in to disperse them, he said. A recent clash was described in a front-page story in La Presse.

The congregation has filed complaints with police that the Lubavitchers have repeatedly tried to "intimidate" members from entering the church, have sprayed graffiti on the church and its school bus, and that, in at least one instance, they grabbed a Bible from one congregant and threw it out of reach.

The congregation has also charged that one of the Lubavitchers has on more than one occasion and before more than one witness threatened to burn down the church.

Lubavitch spokesperson, Rabbi Zushe Silberstein, although not present at the demonstrations, vehemently denied that any involved would ever make such a threat or use any form of physical harassment.

"These are decent, good kids. They are not aggressive... They have been raised from birth to feel for another Jewish brother. They only have love in their hearts... There may be shouting matches, but not physical confrontation. That is not the Lubavitch way."

The students, he said, are doing what they can to counter a missionary campaign by the messianics that has "lately become bolder, more vicious, more dishonest and sneaky.

"They are disguising themselves as Jews, holding services on Shabbat, wearing kippot, using the Star of David and other Jewish symbols, when basically what they want to do is convert innocent, vulnerable Jews to Christianity."

Rabbi Silberstein said the messianics are "targeting" recent Russian immigrants because they did not practise any religion in the former Soviet Union under decades of communism and know very little about Judaism. They are also susceptible to a missionary's appeal because they are often having difficulties adjusting to a new culture and may also be in economic need.

He charged that the messianics provide food and entertainment to the immigrants as a means of attracting them to the church. Before Shavuot, he said, they advertised a program of Jewish music.

He suggests that this sort of "false advertising" might actually be illegal, noting that the term "kosher style" cannot be used by food purveyors.

The messianics appear to have "infinite amounts of money," Rabbi Silberstein added. He said they have distributed flyers and posters in the area, in Russian, that appear to be specifically aimed at Jews.

"[The students] go there [to the church] to tell people the way it is, to let them know this is not a Jewish place... they are being misled," he said.

"Lubavitch has always been in the forefront of the battle for Judaism."

Livshits does not deny that the House of David is reaching out to Russian immigrants, Jewish and non-Jewish, mainly through written material, never door-to-door. "In Canada, we are supposed to have freedom of religion," said Livshits, who has been living in Canada for 17 years and became a Christian while living in Saskatoon.

He began the group in May of last year, and today about 30 people attend its meetings and about half are Jews. He also makes no apologies for wearing a kippah or a tallit or for blowing the shofar.

Livshits and Chris Adlam, son of Bethlehem Healing Fountain's pastor, said they would be willing to sit down with Lubavitch leaders and talk in a peaceable way, but no such meeting has come about. "These people have a mission. You can't get too far with them. It's like talking to the wall," Rabbi Silberstein said.

Adlam said that the Lubavitch's dispute may be with the messianic group, but it is church property and members that are being menaced, and warned that does not sit well with the community.

Rabbi Israel Sirota, director of Lubavitch's Russian-Jewish program and a Soviet native, said that over the past year many Russian Jews have told him they have been contacted by the House of David. Lubavitch has made an intense effort for many years to bring traditional Judaism to the Soviet immigrants and provides them with many educational and cultural activities, as well as material assistance.

However, he does not believe the students are taking the right approach. He feels the Jewish community, including FEDERATION CJA and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, should get together and devise a more professional and "diplomatic" means of countering missionaries, as is done in Toronto and elsewhere.

"The community spent so much money to bring the Russian Jews here, now they are losing them."

Mendel's Children

A Family Chronicle

by Cherie Smith

"Mendel's Children is an unforgettable, multigenerational story. The stuff of which family legends and television miniseries are made!" (The Midwest Book Review)

"The author has lovingly pieced together stories both happy and sad of four generations of her family – tracing their footsteps from the shtetls of Eastern Europe to the towns of the Canadian West." (Canadian Living magazine)

"Ordinary family rendered extraordinarily ... early-century life in Prairie town portrayed with wit and feeling." (Elaine Kalman Naves, The Montreal Gazette)

"... a charming saga of surprising depth that is a pleasure to read.... Ms. Smith has struck a balance between anecdotes and remarkably readable history." (The Western Jewish Bulletin)

"The only thing stranger than one's own clan is somebody else's, which is what makes this 'family chronicle' so delicious." (Saturday Night magazine)

Interactive panel discussion lets audience participate

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Six interactive panel discussions were a new feature introduced at the recent 25th Plenary Assembly of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

The six hour-long sessions were taped by Winnipeg-based Videon Cable Television and will be available for rebroadcast across the country.

Audience participation was invited as the panelists discussed the issues of Jewish Continuity; Prosecution of War Criminals and the Financial Restitution; Israel and the Diaspora; the Future of CJC and other Jewish Institutions; the Clash of Tradition and Technology; and What is Jewish?

CJC Plenary

The moderator of the panels was Winnipeger Jim Carr, a former MLA and former editorial writer and columnist for the Winnipeg Free Press.

Norman Spector, publisher of the Jerusalem Post and the Jerusalem Report, former chief of staff to Brian Mulroney and former Canadian ambassador to Israel, was a panelist at all six sessions.

Norman Spector

At the beginning of each session, Carr introduced the guests and each spoke for three minutes before the audience responded.

In the panel on What is Jewish? Spector was joined by Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress (WJC); Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa; and Rabbi Michal Shekel, a Reform rabbi.

"Today ... Jewishness has been inculcated into society as a whole," Steinberg said. "The stereotypes aren't as pernicious as they used to seem. We are not afraid to appear to be Jewish."

Although there is a biological aspect to Jewishness – as in screenings for certain genetic diseases – we are not a race, Rabbi Shekel said. "You can't convert to a race. Whether you identify as Jewish through a love of bagels, Israel Bonds or Torah, all are valid," she said.

"It used to be that if you went to synagogue, you were Jewish," said Rabbi Bulka. "That is as effective a definition as saying if you go to a chicken yard, it makes you a chicken. Going to synagogue is only part of the answer.

"The major problem in defining Jewishness has to do with Jewish identity," he noted. "We tend to want to concentrate on commandments that are 'sexy' and visible to attract the next generation. But that is not where the action is."

Spector said that Jewish should be as inclusive a term as possible, welcoming anyone who defines himself as Jewish. Rabbi Bulka, however, said that self-definition is only the beginning point. There have to be some standards after that beginning that most people accept.

The Jewish Continuity panel featured Rabbi Israel Singer, secretary general of WJC, Winnipeg's Rabbi Allân Green, and Dr. Norma Joseph of Concordia University's Department of Religion, in addition to Spector.

Rabbi Singer suggested that Jewish continuity is a misnomer. "What we need is a Jewish rebirth, a renaissance, a reassessment of where we are today and how we can rebuild what we have lost," he said.

Joseph expressed a similar view saying that what we need is a Jewish present from which a Jewish future will follow.

"If we don't celebrate Judaism now, there will be no future," echoed Rabbi Green. "Modern Judaism is materialistic, secular and burdened by scientific skepticism. Too many of us are unable to appreciate the moment, the now."

One of two additional, non-televised talks debated whether dialogue is possible between Jewish groups and evangelical Christians. It featured Hal Joffe, a Calgary lawyer who chairs the CJC's national community relations committee, and Dr. James Beverley, a Baptist minister and professor of theology in Toronto.

National unity

The other, a session on national unity featured Max Bernard, a Montreal lawyer who chairs the CJC's national unity committee; Brian Schwartz, University of Manitoba law professor; and constitutional expert Phil Fontaine, the grand chief of the Assembly of First Nations.

Fontaine spoke of First Nations' efforts to find their rightful place in Canadian society. He used words such as "sovereignty" and "self-determination," but stressed that they have a different meaning for native people than for the Québécois.

Schwartz introduced the concept of a moral argument for federalism – that a federal system with two levels of government is a system of checks and balances that protects its citizens from potential tyranny. He said the federal government must become more visible in Quebec and should be seen to be working for the public good.

Bernard spoke of the CJC's role in the 1995 referendum and stressed the need for Congress to continue to work in cooperation with other ethnic groups for a strong and united Canada.

Diamonds are forever

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Mark Lash started selling jewelry from his mother's dining room some 15 years ago.

Today his company, Mark Lash Designs, which specializes in custom-made gold jewelry and is known for its selection of quality diamonds, has two retail locations, and a western representative.

And he's building a large factory/showroom in Richmond Hill, which he says will be one of the largest jewelry stores in Canada.

His stores are at 938 Eglinton Ave. W. (256-5229) and in Richmond Hill at 155 East Beaver Creek Rd., #18, (905-881-5229). In Western Canada, customers can contact Sharon Filkow (204-488-0076) in Winnipeg.

"I always had a love of jewelry," Lash, 33, said recently. "My mom loved jewelry and I would tag along with her. As a teenager, I wanted to have a part-time business. I started making jewelry when I was 15."

He said he also enjoyed accompanying his father on business calls. Visiting one of his father's clients, a jewelry manufacturer, Lash said he was "just fascinated" by the factory when he toured it with the owner.

"I watched how models were carved from wax and I said to myself, 'That seems like something I could do.' So I started carving rings out of balls of wax."

He had the wax models – abstract initial rings – cast in gold, and then he did the hand-polishing with some small tools he owned.

His parents built him a showroom under the garage. "Whenever I was open, 30 to 100 people would be traipsing through my mother's home," he said. Eight years ago he purchased an industrial unit in Richmond Hill.

Lash employs six jewellers and three gemologists, and his wife Dalia is now training to be a gemologist.

Chief gemologist Louise Alexander, manager of the Richmond Hill outlet, said she helps clients make informed decisions about buying diamonds and other precious stones. "They need to know about the four Cs – clarity, color, cut and carat."

She said the clarity of the diamond is not that visible to the naked eye and some customers sacrifice clarity for a stone with better color. Not everyone has the budget for an expensive diamond ring and staff try to meet their needs by adjusting the setting as well as the size and clarity of the stones.

Lash has designed several unique settings, Alexander said. "He's working with white gold quite a bit and the square shank, the part of the ring that sits on the finger."

The store also carries bracelets, earrings, necklaces and other items by Italian designers and there is a selection of silver items for more modest gifts, she said.

Lash stressed that his company has a reputation for fair pricing and honesty. "We're known to be very honest. We work on volume. We're a wholesale manufacturer to the public."

Another jewelry company with a reputation for fairness and honesty is Laurentian Jewellers, T.O. Ltd. (782-3588), located at 1858 Avenue Rd., Suite 200. The entrance is on Old Orchard Grove.

"When you go into Laurentian, you're always going to get quality jewelry at the right price. You don't have to wait for sales because we don't believe in sales. If you want a diamond, we have many nice stones to choose from and at Laurentian, you'll get the best price," said store manager Michel Korman.

The company, which opened its Toronto doors two months ago, is a branch of the Montreal-based Laurentian Jewellers, the company founded by brothers Alex, Aaron and George Korman some 50 years ago.

George's son Michel, 32, a certified GIA gemologist with 12 years of experience, recently moved here with his family to run the Toronto branch.

He said the company has long been known for its custom work, particularly for remodelling diamond rings. "We do our own custom wax models. We can also reproduce almost anything."

And you can count on Laurentian to give a fair appraisal, he added.

"Someone will bring in their grandparent's old jewelry. They want to make something up to date and in style. We can look at what they have and modify it." These days, platinum, as well as two-toned settings which are generally done in white and yellow gold, are more in demand for engagement rings. Platinum is heavier and more expensive than gold and looks very similar to white gold, Korman noted.

He said the solitaire diamond continues to be the most popular style for engagement rings, but pear-shaped and marquis-shaped diamonds are no longer as popular as they used to be. "Our customers are buying round brilliant, and square or princess cut. People are going for more classic looks."

New ring styles Laurentian is offering are laser cut princess diamonds – multiple diamonds channel-set next to each other by laser cutting and fit side by side without gold between the diamonds, Korman said. "It's a very clean look."

He said in Montreal, Laurentian is seeing the third generation of customers at the store. Grandmothers who went to Laurentian Jewellers to buy their engagement rings have come back with their daughters and now the same customers are bringing their granddaughters.

For bat mitzvah gifts he recommended Add-a-Cube, individual 14-karat gold boxes with carved initials; the boxes go on chains of the customer's choice. He also said Laurentian's quality watches would make ideal gifts for many occasions.

Consultants ensure your party goes well

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Today, more and more people hire consultants to help organize major events such as weddings. Why? Are they necessary? And if so, how should you choose yours?

Consultants Raquel Sananes-Grad (398-0217) and Risa Gold (905-882-5044) have well-thought-out answers to these questions.

First, advises Gold, understand why you need a consultant. People who plan their own events often underestimate the complexities of organizing a major celebration. Besides, if you're emotionally involved, it's hard to be objective. A consultant has emotional distance, making planning easier.

A consultant, Sananes-Grad agrees, is no longer a luxury, but a kind of insurance that things will go well. Gold compares herself to a project manager involved at every stage from preliminaries to the event itself.

Find someone you're comfortable with, says Gold, and be totally honest with each other.

Whether for a gala affair or an intimate gathering, Sananes-Grad maintains, a consultant must be a good listener – all the more so, for a milestone like a wedding.

Social changes, Gold observes, mean that traditions and customs are no longer rules, but guidelines. People marry older; they're more mature and less willing to let the consultant decide everything. On the other hand, with more women working, fewer have time to organize a simchah.

While the bride still does most of the work, Sananes-Grad says, the men play a bigger role in planning weddings than in the past, and the consultant also has to "click" with the groom and the in-laws.

Remarriage and blended families, adds Gold, mean that a consultant must often mediate to insure that everyone is pleased with the way the wedding is staged.

Sananes-Grad, who sees her work as beginning long before the event itself, divides it into two parts: making contacts and organizing or coordinating.

A good consultant covers every detail from wedding cakes to hotels. She needn't be an expert on, say, videography, says Gold, but she has to know good work when she sees it.

Other things being equal, the consultant with more contacts is better, but it's not that simple. Names, says Gold, you can get from reading ads. From a huge selection, the consultant helps choose the professionals that best suit you, for talent, experience, organization, and rapport.

Make sure your consultant is up to date on who's new in business, and who's retired. Gold also values wholesale contacts who can save you money, and newcomers, who will go an extra mile in order to build their reputation.

A consultant also has to be a judge of character. Sometimes, Gold says, she should go with you to meet other professionals and help evaluate them.

> A good judge of character

Sananes-Grad points out that this is more vital in certain areas. It is most important for a band leader, for example, to tap into your guests' mood.

A consultant with experience in many kinds of events, Sananes-Grad says, will know more people, respect different traditions and have more ideas. She can work on any affair, private or corporate, secular or religious, big or small, upscale or downscale.

Furthermore, Gold says, an experienced consultant can allocate your budget better.

Choose a consultant as soon as you know the date and don't procrastinate till the one you want is booked in full. A year, even a year and a half, isn't too early for weddings; two to three years are good for bar mitzvahs.

Booking early allows more time to decide all the details, and this can save money, because a consultant can offer a wider choice of referrals. If caterers and others need advance booking, says Sananes-Grad, the consultant needs it even more.

Give the gift of gold that keeps on giving

By REVA KAISER
Special to The CJN

Matnas Zahav (the gift of gold), is an innovative gift-giving service that is making waves in the Toronto Jewish community, as more and more givers and recipients recognize its practical benefits and understated elegance.

A project of the Toronto Cheder's Mothers' Association, Matnas Zahav pools the monetary contributions of multiple gift-givers into one magnificent gift for the recipient on a Cambridge-Mercantile Gold Certificate, representing actual gold.

The benefits for the gift-giver are many: no need to expend energy thinking up the perfect gift, no time-consuming shopping trips, no messy wrapping sessions and no more belated deliveries. Cost factors in as well: Say goodbye to the added GST, PST and gift-wrapping, and to the extra expenses of postage or delivery.

"The general response," says Edie Bench, co-president of the Mothers' Association and coordinator of the service, "is that once you've used it, you're hooked on it; it's so simple!"

Gift-givers choose from denominations of $10, $18, $25, $36, $54, $72, $100 or more. Gifts of $120 or more are processed individually, and the recipient is presented with a gold certificate and card from that person alone.

In addition to simplifying the gift-giving process, both givers and recipients are involved in the important mitzvah of tzedakah, as a small percentage goes towards the Toronto Cheder, a young day school in Toronto. Receipts are issued annually for the charitable component of the gifts.

"Matnas Zahav is the perfect gift-giving solution for the busy homemaker and career woman," says Shoshana Zolty, lecturer and author. "Knowing that it helps a worthy tzedakah also provides a great deal of satisfaction."

Matnas Zahav is an excellent gift for all occasions, from weddings and engagements to bar and bat mitzvot, graduations, births or any special occasion. The gift of Matnas Zahav is an especially appropriate way to mark a golden anniversary.

"With so many simchahs – especially in the Orthodox circles," says Bench, "we needed to simplify the gift-giving process without compromising on the gift. With Matnas Zahav, you can rely on the fact that you're giving a unique and valuable gift that is very well-received."

Mitzvah of tzedakah

Not only do givers enjoy giving Matnas Zahav, but recipients are equally enthusiastic about it. New couples often don't need another vase or glass bowl; bar mitzvah boys lose interest in more knick-knacks for their desks and shelves. If the recipient chooses, the gold certificate can be exchanged for its cash equivalent or for the actual gold bar it represents.

"As a giver," says Linda Hofstedter who has participated in Matnas Zahav since its inception, "I appreciate the convenience, the novelty and the elegance of the gift. And as a recipient, well... you should have seen my son's face light up when his packages arrived."

Hand-delivered, Matnas Zahav is beautifully presented in a glossy, beribboned portfolio that houses both the certificate and the gift card. The elegant card identifies the recipient and occasion, followed by the gift-givers' names. Beside these names are gift icons representing the amount given. Facing the gift card is the official gold certificate, documenting how many ounces of gold the recipient now owns. Also included in the package is a brochure describing Matnas Zahav and an official letter of ownership from Cambridge Precious Metals.

Cambridge Precious Metals has graciously waived the redemption charges of cashing these certificates and is also covering all packaging costs.

The Toronto Cheder's Mothers' Association is running this project not only as a community service, but also as a fundraising effort. Other efforts include the annual tea and last year's Purim sales of Megillot Esther. Money raised covers necessities that the school does not have a budget for, such as a new computer for its administration.

Matnas Zahav can be ordered up to four weeks after the occasion. To order Matnas Zahav, call Karen at 789-2320, or for more information, contact Edie Bench at 785-6202.

A photo is worth a thousand words

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

In the view of Greg Dean of Signature Photography (784-4488), it is important to have a good working relationship with your photographer.

Talent is a must, he says, but you have to like his individual style as well.

It is natural to choose someone with experience, says Stuart Sibulash of Sibulash Photography (598-2241) so look for referrals and recommendations.

Of Dean's clients, 30 percent know him from a simchah where he worked for a friend or relative, and 20 percent are repeat clients.

Don't talk budget or other important factors on the phone, Sibulash urges. See the photographer and his work, and try to get to know each other.

The photographer must be easily accessible, and not get fazed if anything goes wrong, he says.

Your photographer needn't have the latest state of the art equipment, says Sibulash, but it should be durable, reliable and well maintained. Backup equipment is essential.

Both Dean and Sibulash put tact and respect high on the list of qualities a photographer needs. He has to make sure everyone gets into the pictures and does not feel slighted. In situations such as those in which relatives of divorcees will be at the same event, tact is especially important.

These days, Sibulash observes, clients are more thorough and sophisticated. Dean, however, who likes to have fun as he works, warns that if you're too much of a perfectionist, you won't enjoy your event; so lighten up a bit.

Book six months ahead for weddings, a year for a bar or bat mitzvah, Sibulash advises.

Even two years ahead is not too early, says Dean. He has seen clients come in 1½ years in advance, and be disappointed to discover the date is gone. Some photographers already have dates for 2000.

Start looking as soon as you know the date and place, Dean advises, but if you do not know the location and do want a particular photographer, book him right away.

"Every time you get a professional you want to work at your simchah," he explains, "your relaxation quotient goes up."

Sibulash, in contrast, advises knowing the location and who the caterers are before you come to see the photographer.

That way, you know the layout and the ambience. Thinking of a reception, for example, you should take into account the fact that hotel lobbies usually have high ceilings and ample light, while older halls are darker.

While Dean and Sibulash have different approaches to some details of working with your photographer, they agree on essentials.

Photography is both an art and a business, so anyone who does it well will have a variety of good qualities. Find these qualities, and you've found your photographer – and will have taken one big step toward putting on an event where a good time is had by all.

Making a party happen

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Jack Nodel, owner of Universal Sound Entertainment (905-479-1381), knows how to make a party happen.

Nodel, who has owned the 18-year-old company for about eight years, recently put on his 15,000th party.

His speciality, he says, is making sure that everyone – adults and kids – have a great time. Games such as Rock Through the Ages, says Nodel, "are based on music spanning many years, so everyone gets into it. Our destination contest, which consists of songs about different places, is also popular. Whatever we do, we make sure that everyone at the party can enjoy it."

Every booking comes with a large prize package so someone is always winning something.

"Kids and adults love it. Everyone likes to win."

To make a party successful, says Nodel, a disc jockey has to be much more than a music player. "It is his job to motivate the guests throughout the evening. If one song isn't getting the guests up and dancing, then another has to be chosen quickly. There must never be a dry spell."

His basic package includes two disc jockeys and the client can then decide if they want to build on that, he says.

"If they want one or more dancers, that can easily be arranged. The important thing is that we can work on a budget."

Nodel stresses that clients always get the disc jockey they request. "There are no surprises. We also use a premium sound system for every event – large or small."

His light show, he says, "helps make the party. We use laser lights and a lighting system that creates an atmosphere similar to a large television production. The light shines from above and is reflected so it makes for a real party atmosphere. The cyber lights make the room look like an elegant disco. Any room looks like a party room with our lighting."

All clients get a professional consultation with their booking. "We can help orchestrate the evening. We work with the caterer or party consultant, or we can help coordinate the candlelighting or speeches. We make things as easy as possible for our clients"

Universal now has its own venue for parties, in an open atrium at the Vaughan City Playhouse in Thornhill.

"Our clients can have a party there or at a venue of their choice. We are very flexible," says Nodel.

Funky, fun flowers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Flowers are a perfect addition to any size party, from an intimate dinner to a lavish ball, says Elaine Birnbaum, owner of Greenleaves & Petals (905-709-4080).

"One of the best things about flowers is that they suit every taste and every budget. Flowers can be funky, fun or intimate. A lot of decorating ideas include fresh flowers," she says.

A bar or bat mitzvah is a happy occasion and the hall should reflect that happiness, says Elaine.

"When a child finishes reading from the Torah, he has a lot of dreams and hopes, and that feeling should carry through in the flowers. If guests see bright flowers in orange, yellow, pink or blue they will feel renewed and hopeful. Flowers such as gerberas, sunflowers, lilies or tulips are uplifting and bright."

On the other hand, she says, flowers can be quiet and subdued. "Soft pastels with just a hint of color also add something to a room. Flowers are versatile. They can say a lot."

Elaine employs two full-time designers who have won awards for artistic design at the Canada Blooms show held at the Metro Convention Centre.

"Our florists have credentials from the Canadian Academy of Floral Art. They are trained and they do an apprenticeship, so they are skilled at what they do. Customers need to know that they are dealing with professional florists," she says.

When people come in, her staff is prepared to help them plan exactly what it is they need.

"We will even visit the venue, if need be, to see how the room can be decorated. Sometimes people just don't know where to begin. A skilled florist can guide them through all their decisions."

Elaine carries flowers from such places as Holland, Israel, South America and Europe.

"We can get most flowers all year round, although the price might change if the flower is out of season. If someone comes in and asks for a flower that we think is not practical, we try to lead them in the right direction. We can make suggestions that the client may not have thought about. We may suggest something with the same kind of look and color, but one that is in season or is easier to obtain.

"Whether it is for a [brit milah], a pool party, a dinner party or a lavish affair, there is the right flower to enhance the mood."

Other advertising florists are: Designs by Karen Baker (886-8100); Van Bassen Flowers (222-6751).

Interactive games add a new dimension

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Want to give your child a bar or bat mitzvah party that will be the talk of the town? Call Peter Gismondi, owner of The Great Canadian Amusement Company.

Gismondi (650-5437), owner of the 6-year-old company, supplies parties with interactive equipment such as an inflatable rock climbing wall, laser tag, inflatable jumping castles, obstacle courses, 24-foot slides or sumo wrestling suits.

"Kids and adults have a ball with laser tag. We set up a dark, inflatable maze and suit the guests up with a laser gun and vest. Ten people can play at once, and we keep score, so there is a winner at the end of the session. It's a great way to keep busy when the adults are having dinner. We can put the maze in a large hall, a park or even in someone's backyard, so it really is not limited," says Gismondi.

The rock climbing wall, he says, is generally suited for the outdoors. "The 24-foot-high wall is made of moulded fibreglass that looks just like rock and there are three degrees of difficulty, so anyone from a young child to an adult can enjoy it."

A hit at many parties are the racing cars that run on a 3 ft. x 25 ft. oval track.

"Two-feet-long cars resembling those from the Indianapolis 500 carry the guests, who freewheel around the track and have races," he says.

Another favorite, says Gismondi are the sumo wrestling suits. "People put on these totally padded suits and just goof around. They love it!"

He says that hosts who want to add some interactive activities to their party should come to his showroom to see his equipment and watch some videos.

"We can help them decide what is best for their type of party."

Interactive games are for those who want to add a new dimension to their party, says Gismondi.

"It is not meant to replace the music, but rather give people something else to do. It really gives kids a chance to meet each other, because they are playing together."

Decorations add to any type of party

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Balloons are a sure way of turning an empty room into a lively, bright party place.

Brian O'Connor, who co-owns The Party Exchange (636-8111) with Cary Albert, carries 110 different latex balloons and at least 100 foil balloons.

"They are a great way to decorate on a budget. Most halls are not decorated, and when we bring in the balloons, it makes the difference between night and day. It fills the room and adds color," O'Connor says.

Balloons can last from 16 to 24 hours, he says, depending on the temperature of the room. "Air-filled balloons last longer than helium, but helium balloons float around the room. We've tied together 10 large balloons and had them float on the ceiling. It brightens up the room enormously."

They also make great centrepieces, he says. "We sell bags of candy hearts or chocolate kisses to anchor the centrepiece. Guests can eat the candy, or the centrepiece can be given out as a prize. Everyone loves it.

"When clients come in," says O'Connor, "we discuss the budget, and then we talk about what we can do. I have been into most halls; so I can picture what can be done with the room. A large room with a small number of guests requires more decorations than a room that is jam packed. When there is lots of open space, we have lots of room to fill it up."

O'Connor can also help clients develop the theme for their party. "Hockey is a popular theme. We've created centrepieces with actual hockey sticks and have decorated the sign-in board around the theme."

The Party Exchange carries a wide range of materials for people who want to decorate their own party. Micky Mouse, Barney and Winnie the Poo are only some of the characters the store sells.

Jack Schnoll, owner of Kosher 'N Natural (789-7173), has been in business for about 16 years. He rents out candy floss, popcorn, sno-cones, soft pretzels and mini-donut machines.

"The pretzels are a hit, especially when they are topped with the honey mustard, honey garlic or salsa toppings. They've become very popular at weddings during the cocktail hour, or they may be served with the soup," he says.

Schnoll, who also does party decor, says he can help create any theme. "We've done celestial, Academy Awards or sports centrepieces, some with a candy base, others with styrofoam."

A favorite item at Kosher 'N Natural is the chocolate smash cake. "The guest of honor breaks it with a mallet and then he shares it with his guests. It is a guaranteed hit."

Schnoll has decorated the smash cake with the bar or bat mitzvah's name, or with a picture that reflects the theme of the evening.

He recently had concessions at the community Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration. "Everyone loved the machines, from adults to kids. Somehow candy floss brings out the kid in everybody," he says.

Your invitations deserve careful attention

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When you're planning a big celebration or party, entertainers, caterers and others are high on your priority list. You want quality invitations too, however, and they deserve careful attention.

The invitations set the tone for your event, Barbara Mortfield of Barbara Mortfield Invitations (905-738-1232) points out.

Not only that, they're mementos of the occasion. People keep them in their scrapbooks beside their photos and other reminders of that special day.

What's more, making your invitations can be fun. Both Mortfield and Gilda Lefton of Stationery Plus (905-881-5588) have many ideas on how to choose your invitation consultant and how to enjoy working together.

Before you meet your consultant, Mortfield recommends, know what quantity of invitations you want; write down the exact details of addresses, dates and times, and choose your color scheme, script and wording.

Lefton suggests being open-minded on style, though, until you have seen what's available. The selection is huge, in everything from handmade to computerized work.

Your invitation, Mortfield says, should "look expensive, but not be expensive."

Keep your budget range in mind; don't be tempted to overspend, says Lefton, and look for someone whose stock and services cover every price range.

Experience in this business is a must. See if your friends can recommend someone to you, advise both Lefton and Mortfield.

Mortfield lists five things you should expect as a client: attention, time, advice, patience and a professional standard of work.

Lefton also stresses that when you meet with your invitation designer, you both owe each other undivided attention.

She should offer a large selection of basics, such as paper stocks and accessories, and Mortfield advises choosing a consultant who offers the whole package: invitations, RSVPs, thank you notes, place cards, party cards for a bar mitzvah, calligraphy and kippot.

Look for someone who lets you be creative if you want to, although, Lefton observes, not every client wants this.

In organizing a big event, stress is common, partly because of the importance of the occasion and – especially with weddings – the need to please two families. Even so, Mortfield and Lefton both urge you to minimize stress and find a consultant who doesn't pressure you; this makes it easier to think, plan, and enjoy working together.

Set the tone

While some people feel a lot of tension when planning a big affair, Lefton knows others who hardly suffer. Even those who thrive on stress usually want to minimize it. And because doing the invitations is easier than the other things you have to do, it can be virtually stress-free.

Book four months ahead, at least, Mortfield advises and Lefton thinks even six is not too early. This makes it easier to be sure all the paper stocks and other things you like will be available, especially if they're coming from the United States; it also allows time to make changes. Shipments can be rushed, but they end up costing more.

Mortfield holds three meetings with the client: one, to establish rapport and go over available stocks and prices; another, where you bring your spouse and often your family, to work out details and start on the wording; and a third, to look at a proof to check spelling, spacing and typeface. Mortfield insists on always working with a proof.

Lefton agrees that everyone with a reason to be included in your decisions should come with you to a meeting, to confer in her store or home studio – say, for a bar mitzvah, both parents and the boy. This way, everyone sees what's available and has a say.

In Mortfield's view, a good invitation specialist enjoys being helpful. Sometimes, for example, she might mediate disagreements about a script, typeface or wording. This is over and above the details of, say, calling a synagogue to confirm addresses and times.

Punctuality, planning ahead, honesty about what you want and consideration are qualities which Lefton values highly in a client. They help her give you what you want and make her work enjoyable. If you have these qualities, both you and your professional invitation consultant will work well together.

Get maximum benefit with a gift registry

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

By now, gift registries are common. Originally for china and tableware, they have expanded to items such as furniture and even hardware.

They're not only for weddings. You can register for other family events like Mother's Day, birthdays, baby showers and bar and bat mitzvahs.

Bronson's China and Gifts (905-881-9930) has one of Toronto's best-known registries. Proprietor Ilene Bronsteter offers you her insights into choosing a registry and deriving maximum value from it.

A registry's major benefit is that it allows a bride to make a wish list, and see her wishes fulfilled. For guests, the major benefit is that they can choose gifts more easily. Knowing what the bride wants, they can pick something within their own budget, and be sure she'll like it.

There are other advantages for the bride. If she has things she doesn't want, and they come from a store where she is registered, it is easier to exchange them. If she gets two identical items, and one is from a store where she is not registered, she can exchange the other piece for something else on her list.

Changes in society make it harder to choose gifts people will like. People marry at an older age, and being more mature, they have stronger ideas of what they like. Details such as the color and shape of the morning coffee cups are important.

Often, the bride and groom live on their own before marrying and when they combine their households, they have a lot of things they need. This can make it complicated for wedding guests to buy for them.

When registering, be clear on what you want. For instance, you may have everyday things already so you'll want to think about more formal items.

Decide on designs and colors and know your personality and tastes. Are you a more formal person, or more casual? Do you like ornate patterns, or simple ones?

While the bride still plays a major role in decisions about tableware, men are becoming more involved. Ilene thinks it especially important that they participate when the time comes to make final decisions.

Get referrals from friends, then visit the stores, and make your choice as soon as you can after you set your wedding date. If you visit three retailers and like them all, you don't have to pick only one. You can register with all three. This may also please some of your guests, if they especially like one of these stores.

Choose a store with a good selection. There are thousands of patterns and designs available. This makes matching and coordinating easier.

Pick a well-organized, computerized registry, and be organized. Keep track of what's been bought as it can change within a day.

Look for rapport, too. Intangible as it is, it is easy to recognize when it's there. It translates into staff who is flexible, who take extra time with you, and who go the extra mile if you need it. Insist on services – gift wrapping is now standard, for example.

Come to the store with a list of what you already have. Ilene advises and let the store know exactly what you want. Even bring pieces in, so the staff can work with them as a guide. The store can sometimes make a perfect match, and can usually coordinate your piece with something they have or can order.

Divide your gift list into categories such as cutlery or flatware, and make a decision on what you want in one category. Once you've made final choices in one area, it's easier for the staff to help you make other choices since they have something to work with.

Ilene sees the purpose of the registry as twofold: helping you put together what she calls "a total tabletop"; and simplifying this part of setting up your household. Anything that simplifies the many decisions you have to make has got to be a good idea – no wonder it's caught on.

Egg-shell color popular for bridal gown

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Shopping at Ritche's for gowns has become a family tradition for many brides.

Second and third generations of Ritche's first customers are buying their bridal gowns where their mothers and grandmothers shopped.

Jack Ritche started the company 46 years ago; he now runs it with his daughter and son-in-law, Vivian and Arthur Prussky.

One of the first wedding gown companies in Toronto, Ritche is known for original designs, according to Vivian Prussky. When former Ritche customers come to choose a bridal gown with their daughters, they'll often describe the dress they purchased when they themselves were brides.

"They usually recall the exact details," Prussky said. "My father still remembers those individual gowns. He did such unique fashion pieces that the women were often buying them straight from the fashion shows. The gowns are still distinguishable."

The Ritche bridal shop at 1662 Avenue Rd. (789-4378) has 6,000 square feet on three levels offering everything for the bridal party down to the last accessory.

On the main floor, you'll find eveningwear and suits for the mother of the bride or a bar or bat mitzvah hostess, along with a collection of daywear.

On the second floor, Ritche offers more than 700 different styles of wedding gowns, with five private consultation rooms. The lower level is the accessories and fitting department.

"We have our seamstresses on the premises, some who have worked for us for 25 years," Prussky said.

The shop carries a large selection of manufacturers from across Canada, the United States and Europe. One of their most popular new lines, Pronovias, is made and designed in Spain, she said. "It's exquisitely made out of the finest of fabrics, silk organzas, crepes and chiffons."

Ritche is showing a lot of sleeveless and halter-style dresses, which Prussky described as "very sophisticated and classic-look looking." For the ceremony, most girls cover up with a matching shawl or jacket that comes with the dress, or one can be custom made, she added.

Sheath dresses ares starting to come back and you can see some simple looking styles with just "a little or not a stich of lace or beading," she noted. "The dresses are completely made of silk satin, without lace or beading, just a beautiful cut with halter style criss-cross back, or a drop natural waist and full gathered or pleated skirts."

In contrast to those simple styles, she said, Ritche is also carrying dresses with fully hand-beaded bodices and a full organza skirt with an optional train – long or short or detachable.

Ritche's carries a large selection of mothers' and bridesmaids' dresses. It also carries a line of less formal gowns that start at $500, Prussky said.

She said Ritche also offers brides the convenience of one-stop shopping with bustiers, crinolines, veils, shoes and other bridal items available on the premises.

And Ritche still does a lot of custom design, with the master himself, Jack Ritche, Prussky said. "People come specifically for the famous Ritche designs."

Designer Gisella Furfaro (905-264-2746), whose bridal shop is located at 7938 Kipling Ave.in Woodbridge, specializes in custom bridal evening and daywear.

Everything is custom-made according to the needs of the client, said spokesperson Antonella Furfaro, Gisella's sister, who runs the bridal shop with a third sister, Maria.

They started their bridal business because they couldn't find formal wear that appealed to them, Antonella said. She said the advantage of a custom-made gown is that it is designed for a specific individual. "We start from scratch. We design something that will flatter the body type of the client."

People are welcome to come in for a free consultation, Antonella said. Usually, there's a telephone interview first. The consultation is by appointment, so that Gisella can prepare for the meeting and have samples of fabrics on hand.

Silk is the most common fabric used, she said pointing out that there are many types of silk. The fabrics are priced according to the weight and weave. The type of silk chosen will depend on the style of the dress and the budget she said.

She stressed that Gisella Furfaro uses the finest designer fabrics and the company also does its own beading on the premises Any kind of detailing can be arranged.

The egg shell or off-white is one of the most popular colors for bridal gowns, Antonella said. "Sometimes an egg shell color is more flattering to the skin and hair color than a blue-white."

Antonella described the company's approach as "consultative:" they work within people's budget and with their specific tastes in mind.

She said at Gisella Furfaro, veils are custom made and the shop also carries bridal accessories, such as hosiery, lingerie and evening shoes, as well as designer jewelry and headpieces; jewelry by Nina Ricci and Christian Dior and Tiaras by Paris, an exclusive line of tiaras.

She said that in August, Gisella Furfaro will be carrying Stuart Weitzman's bridal and eveningwear shoe collection from Spain.

Kosher wines have come a long way

The slogan, "You've come a long way baby," certainly applies to kosher wines.

Where once kosher was synonymous with sweet and syrupy, kosher wines now include a vast array of Bordeaux, Cabernets, Chablis, Chiantis and other dry wines, as well as champagnes, Rieslings and Malaga wines, to name but a few of the types now available in Toronto.

One of the companies responsible for expanding the selection of kosher wines is Mazel Wines (631-8071) located at 3825 Bathurst St. in North York. For more than three decades, Mazel, the Ontario agent for Royal Wines has represented Kedem and the Herzog family wines, among other companies.

You can find more than 20 different types of Mazel's wines at the recently opened kosher wine kiosk at the Clark and Hilda Plaza in Thornhill.

Run by the Liquor Control Board of Ontario, it offers a broad range of products, including a California red Zinfandel, a late harvest Riesling, Herzog's Cabernet Sauvignon Special Reserve, and from Italy, Bartenura Chianti and Valpolicella, said Mazel's marketing director, Janet Klugsberg.

"Kosher wines needn't be sweet, just special. Our listings are always increasing. We're always working to bring to the kosher consumer a better selection and better kosher wines."

She said the selection of kosher wines has increased to meet the growing demand for better quality wines, noting that the first kosher Bordeaux hit the market some 20 years ago. "Our wines rival the best of non-kosher wines."

Klugsberg said the Herzog family, originally from Europe, were wine-makers for eight generations. Now based in the United States, they have focused on improving the quality and expanding the selection of kosher wines.

Among the wines Mazel promotes are those from Gan Eden, a small California winery which has produced an award-winning black muscat wine, she said.

She was also excited about bringing in Alfasi Cabernet Sauvignon, the first kosher wine made in Chile. "Chilean wines have been experiencing phenomenal sales due to the quality/price ratio. We're very excited that we can finally bring this to the kosher consumer."

Klugsberg said Mazel Wines will assist people in the selection of wines for a simchah. "Usually we work with listed products." She advised people wanting this service to book an appointment.

These days the rules about the types of wines one matches with foods are "not hard and fast," according to Klugsberg. Chicken can be eaten with red or white wines, as can beef, but white wines, which are lighter, are generally eaten with fish, she said. She noted that because of recent reports on the positive health benefits of red wine, it has become much more popular.

She said champagne and orange juice can be served at a bar or bat mitzvah kiddush, and it is also a popular cocktail at evening receptions, as is straight champagne with a strawberry or raspberry garnish.

Klugsberg also praised the liquor board, which, she said, has come to appreciate and help promote kosher wines over the years.

Ketubot designed to your taste

By STACEY STEIN
Student Intern

A walk through calligraphy artist Karny Rivlin Vorona's house reveals her passion for intricate detail, the written letter and Judaic themes. The walls are adorned with her artwork, showcasing her original, hand-made ketubot, naming certificates, family trees and other Judaic artwork.

Born in Israel, Vorona picked up Hebrew calligraphy while working as a draftswoman and graphic designer at an architectural design firm in Tel Aviv. After moving to Toronto in 1978, Vorona immersed herself in calligraphic art and took calligraphy courses in English.

She believes that artists must continually work at improving their skills.

"Every artist has to keep on developing one way or another," she says. "If you don't have contact with other artists or you don't take workshops or teach, you regress."

Vorona consistently challenges herself by taking courses and work shops. She is also a member of the Calligraphic Arts Guild of Toronto and served as its president in 1993 to '94.

Vorona has been creating art as far back as she can remember.

"I think I was born with a pencil crayon in my hand," she says with a laugh. "I always drew and painted and experimented with new things."

Vorona says calligraphic art appeals to her because of its structure and the exactness of the design. She has been creating ketubot and other artwork professionally for about 15 years. All of her works are originals, with no prints available anywhere.

She needs about two to three months notice before starting a new project, although the length of time required to create a ketubah or certificate varies, depending on the design.

Vorona uses a wide range of materials in her creations. For ketubot, she uses mostly gouache, acrylics and watercolors. She buys materials whenever she travels, and her collection includes items from Central America, South America, Europe and Israel.

"Wherever I am, I look for art supply stores, and I could spend hours looking for new things," she says.

"Some [clients] come with their own idea of the design they want," she says. "I like to work one-on-one so that I can get a feeling of what they're like and what they want."

Certain recurring symbols and themes pervade her work. These include the pomegranate, a symbol of fertility; the number seven, referring to the days of the week, the branches on the menorah and the seven species; and two interlocked rings, a symbol of unity.

"I work with couples on their ketubah, beautifying the Jewish elements common throughout history," she says.

Her work is also heavily influenced by the Bible and her creations incorporate the animals and flowers referred to in its verses.

But many of her artistic ideas don't have a tangible source.

"It comes from within," she says. "It just pops up in my mind. The more you do it, the more ideas you get."

Vorona's ketubot start at $500. She can be contacted at 226-3131 or at her Web site, [http://web2.ica.net/ketubah].

Lots of fabulous halls to choose from

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Before you book the caterer, buy the dress or hire the band, one of the first steps in making a simchah is deciding on where to hold the party.

If you are in the market for a synagogue with a big banquet hall, one of the places you might consider is the Sephardic Kehila Centre (905-669-7654) at 7026 Bathurst St. in Thornhill.

"The banquet hall, which can accommodate up to 500 dinner guests with a dance floor, is absolutely breathtaking, with detailing in the design and colors that reflect the Sephardic community's Spanish and North African roots," said centre administrator Mercedes Bendayan.

"The room is so exquisite that you really don't need to spend a lot on decor," she said.

The arches and circular windows are typical of the North African architectural style, as are the mosaic tiles on the wall which are done in blues, golds, burgundy and greens; those colors are also echoed in the chair coverings and even the patterns in the wooden floor, she explained.

The vaulted ceiling, which is divided into three sections, is hand-painted in shades of blue to emulate the sky, and each section is adorned with a custom-made chandelier in the Moroccan style, she said.

The three chandeliers each weigh 4,000 pounds and has 729 light bulbs and 108,000 hand-cut jewel crystals. Each has a Hebrew message inscribed on the brass grid, Bendayan noted.

She said the large foyer with its pillars and intricate inlaid marble floors is ideal for serving cocktails and hors d'oevres, and can be a dramatic setting for a chupah; the sanctuary is also available at a nominal charge, as is the outdoor garden which has a chupah.

Five kosher caterers are associated with the Kehila Centre: Beverley Hills Catering, Classic Catering, King Solomon's Caterers, Prestige Fine Cuisine and Tri Elm Catering. Some of the caterers are more specialized in preparing Moroccan food, Bendayan said.

The banquet hall can be split into thirds to accommodate smaller parties. Beautiful room dividers are available to make the room more comfortable. Room rates vary according to the amount of space rented – one-third of the hall is priced at $250 for the evening while the full hall costs $750.

The banquet hall is equipped with concealed state of the art acoustical and audio visual equipment. The building has an indoor parking lot and elevator, and is completely wheelchair accessible, Bendayan noted.

Those hosting a simchah might consider renting space in one of the two stately 1930s mansions on the 52-tree filled acres of The Estates of Sunnybrook, (440-2500) which are located on the Sunnybrook Health Science Centre campus.

Comprised of Vaughan Estate and McLean House, the homes can be used for both social and corporate functions according to Kirk Brady, managing director of the Estates of Sunnybrook.

McLean House, a Georgian-style mansion with several wood-burning fireplaces, has been used for parties since 1985; it can accommodate 75 people for a sit-down dinner and 150 for a cocktail party, Brady said.

"It's perfect for a small wedding. It has formal gardens, as well. We have many outdoor weddings... We do a lot of Jewish weddings and we also do bar and bat mitzvahs."

The conservatory is the main dinner venue at McLean House while the mahogany-paneled dining room is where buffets and/or sweet tables are generally set up, Brady explained.

Extra chairs can be added for weddings in the gardens, which have been restored to their 1930s splendor. McLean House's outdoor patio, with its permanent seating, can accommodate 60 people, he said.

Brady recommended the Vaughan Estate, which he said has a baronial feel, for larger parties. The mansion, which has been a venue for parties since 1991, can accommodate up to 150 people in one of two rooms: the large dining room with its glassed in loggia overlooking the ravine, or a lower-level room with a walkout terrace that can also seat 150 people.

Vaughan Estate has separate entrances so two parties can be run simultaneously.

The cost of renting either mansion is $150 an hour for as long as one needs the facilities; the price includes rental of tables, chairs, dishes, linens, and servers, Brady explained. For kosher affairs, an outside caterer is permitted, but there is an additional charge for the rental of kosher dishes, he added.

To find out more about the services available at Sunnybrook Estates, Brady suggested a visit to the Sunnybrook Estates Web site at [WWW.estatesofsunnybrook.com] or contact sales manager Maureen Wright.

Other advertising kosher places that cater to parties are: Baycrest Hospitality Services (785-2500 ext. 2477); Beth Radom/ Freda Tobler (636-3451); Royalton Banquet & Convention Centre (222-1230). Sheraton Centre Toronto (905-886-9703)

Mister DJ: From zero to Mach 6 in three minutes

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Everybody talks about interactive entertainment today, but how many people provide it? For real interaction, talk to Ed McMurtry of Mister Disc Jockey (905-886-4488).

"My opening number," he says "takes you from zero to Mach 6 in three minutes."

McMurtry has many ways to create fun and entice a crowd to join in. Sometimes he's subtle, sometimes direct; he stages a mix of choreographed and off-the-cuff numbers, amateur and professional, and he uses both live and recorded music, along with singers and dancers.

Most conventional efforts to get people to participate don't work, he says. A 16-year-old standing on a speaker yelling, "Why aren't you dancing?" tends to intimidate rather than encourage. The same goes for hauling a hapless guest onstage and cajoling him to sing.

Instead of embarrassing people, McMurtry entices them to overcome their shyness. "We entertain," he says, "by getting you to entertain yourselves."

He blurs the borders between DJ and performer, performer and audience; and it works. At a bankers' party, he had executives onstage imitating the Beatles, Stones and Village People, and everyone else was partying along with them.

McMurtry rehearses the prepared parts of his show carefully, and places great value on timing. He teaches his people they have 30 seconds to get the audience's attention; if the act works that far, they have another 60. In other words, they have exactly 90 seconds to get the audience involved.

One ingenious way to involve people is with party favors as props. Depending on the theme, any prop might do, but McMurtry stages things so that you need it to do the dance. For a Men in Black theme, for example, you need sunglasses. Getting the glasses puts you in the mood and then you feel more at ease about dancing.

For McMurtry, interacting includes working closely with the other party professionals – with the videographer on lighting, for example, and the caterer on food themes. He keeps their requirements in mind and makes sure his performance is in sync with their work.

Synergy Show

McMurtry puts on the Mister Disc Jockey Show for weddings, bar mitzvahs and corporate events, and the Synergy Show for bar mitzvahs and corporate events. The Synergy Show, with its 12 professional dancers, offers a lively contrast with impromptu numbers where guests perform.

For Synergy, the client picks themes – shows like Rent, for instance, or eras like the '50s or the '70s. The dancers change costumes three times, and each change introduces a new theme.

"Whatever you can think of," says McMurtry, "we'll do a theme for it."

McMurtry also does shows across North America, and is currently preparing to go to Las Vegas. He's had enquiries from as far away as Tel Aviv. He used to get international bookings from visitors to Toronto; now he gets them while working outside the country.

While McMurtry does lots of improvising, he insists on getting certain things exact. For instance, to make sure he has the interactive gear he needs – wardrobes, props, party favors and the like. He ships everything for a booking outside Toronto or Canada.

Because McMurtry attracts adults and children to enjoy the same show, he's been called the Pied Piper of Canada. Recently, a client flew him to Hawaii for a convention booking. The conventioneers had brought their kids. He was to do one show for adults and older teenagers, another for younger teens and kids, but the adults liked their show so much, they brought their children to it.

McMurtry has shared the stage with celebrities such as Don Cherry, Alannah Myles and Ivan (formerly of the '80s pop band Men Without Hats). He's sometimes asked for his autograph; and in 1997 and 1998, Mister Disc Jockey won a Canada-U.S. interactive disc jockey competition.

McMurtry has three walls of testimonials, including some from clients who were surprised at the quality they got on a moderate budget. Successful as he is, he's still not too big to do your bar mitzvah, and for the price of local entertainment, he gives you the quality of an international show.

You don't have to be rich or famous to book Mister Disc Jockey. What you have to do, is want to have fun – and be ready for a totally new experience. Then you'll know why party professionals call him "Mister."

Show is geared to everyone

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Times Square Entertainment (905-881-6400) crosses the boundary between a disc jockey and live entertainment.

Rick Levine, president of the 5-year-old company, has been a bandleader for 22 years; at all parties, he sings live to a digital backtrack.

"The music appeals to the kids and my songs appeal to the adults – it's a great mix. Everyone enjoys it," he says.

Levine is producer of We're Having a Party, a party show that promotes bands, disc jockeys and everyone else connected with the party industry.

"Traditionally, there were bridal shows. We were the first to do a show designated for every type of party."

He developed Times Square Entertainment in order to branch into the interactive DJ market. "DJs are geared to the kids, and I decided with my background, I could build a show that is geared to everyone."

When a client comes in, says Levine, they develop an agenda for the party. "Essentially, I am the event coordinator. I help right from the beginning – from deciding on the decor, to obtaining the giveaways, to deciding if the show should be live or with a DJ. We are the only company that offers a band and a disc jockey, so that we really have a lot of options."

The secret in running a great party, says Levine, is playing the right music at the right time. "Timing is everything. That is why it is important to work with someone who has experience in the industry. The DJ must coordinate with the caterer to ensure that the music stops during dinner because most people want to talk during their meal.

"What I do is sing during the meal; I may come out in a genuine Phantom costume and do a medley of Phantom songs. Whatever it is, I make sure that I am providing the right music at the right moment."

When the music is playing, the sound is from a nightclub-quality sound system, he says.

"The dancers come out in glitter jackets and get the audience motivated. We run contests such as Coke and Pepsi, hoola hoop or limbo, and even the adults are thrilled when they win a prize. Everyone has a great time."

Levine has disc jockey packages ranging from $700 to $3,200, depending on the lighting and number of dancers. The elite package comes with six dancers, staging backdrops and a lighted DJ booth. Computer enhanced lighting and the great sound system add to the party atmosphere, he says.

Levine has recently played at a Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada fundraiser and he will be at the upcoming Temple Kol Ami fundraiser.

Consultants are like insurance

For weddings, both Sananes-Grad and Gold usually have four face-to-face meetings with clients. The first is to get acquainted; the second, to plan the rehearsal. The third is the rehearsal itself, and Gold prefers deciding as many details as possible beforehand, so it runs smoothly. Finally, there's the wedding itself. There's plenty of phone consultation along the way, too, and sometimes other face-to-face meetings.

Your consultant should be a perfectionist, says Sananes-Grad. In a play running for a week, if the opening night has problems, you can fix them for the next performance, but there's no rerun for a wedding. A consultant must get it right the first time.

Other advertising consultants are: Judy Stein (905-764-2728); Marla Kay (905-882-2042); Sarah Cherry (905-764-7121); Up & Coming Events (905-886-8148).

Get dressed up just like a celebrity

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Lou and Wendy Myles mourned the recent death of Frank Sinatra along with the rest of the world. But for them he was more than a legend. Sinatra had been buying Lou Myles' hand-made suits for two decades.

"We just lost a good friend," Wendy said recently. "Sometimes I would meet Frank in Atlantic City or in New York at the Waldorf Astoria where he used to have a suite. I would bring him fabrics. He was our customer for 20 years.

"He was a beautiful dresser, an elegant man. When I first met him in 1988 – Lou knew him longer – I was so nervous. He was charming. He would buy six dinner jackets at a time, twice a year. He was very generous. He would always treat us for dinner."

Wendy Switzer Myles and Frank Sinatra

Lou Myles Disegnatore is one of the last places to buy handmade suits, Wendy said. "We have a factory and retail store in Woodbridge at 380 Millway Ave., (905-738-3333) and a new retail store at 20 Toronto St. (365-7777), half a block north of the King Edward Hotel. It's spectacular with 21-foot pillars."

She described her husband as someone with a "marvellous sense" of fashion and style."

Lou said he became interested in the clothing business as a teenager. "I loved the way Sinatra and Tony Bennett dressed. There were many tailors in my neighborhood. I was always asking them, 'How do you do this? How do you do that?'"

He created his own market niche by designing the ivy jivey suit, which had a very fitted look, he said. "I was getting my share of business from people who wanted to look different. The store took off."

When Lou saw Tony Bennett's English-cut suit at a 1964 performance he decided that it was the style of suit he wanted to make.

An English suit with square shoulders and a tapered waist is the most flattering because it gives "the guy a defined silhouette," Wendy explained.

"The guy's going to look like Arnold Schwarzenegger, who is also our customer. We say our clothing makes a bad figure look good and a good figure look great."

At the Lou Myles factory all the workers specialize in making one part of the suit, such as the pockets, shoulders or lapels. This way, the factory is able to produce 300 hand-made suits a week, Lou said.

"All suits are cut by hand, one by one, and the lining, sleeves and shoulder are set by hand. The shoulder is the key point of the suit. It gives it life. A good suit can last forever."

Most of his suits – they are all made of the finest Italian and English wools – are exported to major American cities, he said.

"You'll find my suits in all the best stores." A third retail store in Windsor was set up to accommodate his many customers in Detroit, he added.

His agents can visit a home or an office, or customers can shop at the retail locations which also stock fine quality shoes, sweaters, and other high-end accessories. Women's suits can also be ordered.

Heritage Clothing (789-5192) at 103 Orfus Rd. is the place to shop for those people seeking fine quality well-priced executive and upper-end suits.

The merchandise is priced well below its competitors, filling a special market niche, says Heritage Clothing president David Rosenberg. "When we started the business there was no one selling high-end clothing at popular prices. That's where Heritage has positioned itself."

He said half the suits come from Italy and they're "all world famous labels. We don't cut the label. We cut the price. We don't have one or two of a size, we have 300 of a size."

The 50,000 square-foot fashion house offers shoppers a huge selection, in all sizes of top quality suits, according to Rosenberg.

"We believe we have the best selection of men's upper-end apparel under one roof in the country. Instead of having 20 locations we have one huge location." The store carries a wide range of accessories with ties priced from $35 to $75.

Half of Heritage's stock is private label, Canadian-made suits made out of the finest Italian fabric, Rosenberg said. "A suit that retails from $250 to $425 is equal in quality to the $895 Canadian-label men's suit found in many fine men's stores," said Rosenberg.

Italian suits that sell for $695 and $895, compare to $2000 Italian designer label suits in other fine men's stores, he said.

"We sell strictly kosher suits. All Heritage suits, including tuxedos, are lined to the knee and made from cloths that conform to halachic specifications."

Tuxedos, which are all made of fine Italian wool, are trimmed with satin on the lapels, and have a protective layer to absorb and camouflage perspiration, Rosenberg noted. "[They] start at $595, and are easily a $1,200 value. For the price of three rentals you have a tuxedo forever."

Heritage carries a large assortment of black-tie accessories which include suspenders, cummerbund sets and pleated shirts with regular and wing-tipped collars.

He said that customers meet the tailor who will do the alterations; he does the pinning and the work on the premises.

"The family aspect distinguishes us from the competition. My father was in the menswear business for 50 years. He passed Heritage Clothing on to me and my sister. I hope we can pass it on to the next generation."

Testimonial to Mandell

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

On Victoria Day, the Sephardic Kehila Centre was rocking with celebrants of all ages, partying at Sari Kraft's bat mitzvah.

In the balloon-festooned banquet hall, people were up dancing during any given song. And one of the people on the dance floor practically the entire evening was the guest of honor herself.

Sari was even up on the stage with the DJ, leading everybody in the dance for the Village People's YMCA.

"My friends pushed me up on the stage," Sari insisted.

But from her big smile, it was evident she was enjoying the limelight and she was quick to admit, "It was fun being up there."

She credited the DJ, Jared Florence, from Mandell Entertainment Group, with making the party a success. She liked the music he played, and she particularly enjoyed dancing to The Time Warp, she said. "It's a really fun song."

Before the simchah, Florence sat down with the family to pick the music for the candlelighting ceremony.

He also chose quieter music during dinner, and when the children finished eating, which they did long before the adults, Florence involved them in dancing and other activities.

Florence, Marnie and Rena are part of the stable of 100 DJs and dancers on the roster of the Mandell Entertainment Group (905-886-4000).

Founded and run by Corey Mandell, 28, the entertainment company is one of Toronto's largest. In addition to providing DJs and dancers for corporate parties and simchahs, the company offers party planning and decorating services. Packages may also include specialty lighting, laser shows and pyrotechnics (indoor fireworks), as well as Karoake machines, fun food carts, and a huge selection of interactive games.

Mandell said his DJs are at more bar and bat mitzvahs than any other group. A DJ himself, he said he's already booked through the year 2000, and many of his more popular DJs are also in high demand.

Mandell attributes his company's popularity to the fact that he and his DJs put on a show.

an interactive approach he introduced in Toronto 10 years ago, he said.

Mandell sends at least two DJs to every party. One takes care of the music – they carry a wide range from international songs to current hits – while the other interacts with the crowd, organizing activities like line dancing or dance contests.

At Amanda Leigh Wyman's bat mitzvah party held across town one week after Sari's, Saul Sacks, another DJ from the Mandell Entertainment Group kept the 130 guests on their toes all evening.

Good music is critical to the success of a party, Marlee Wyman, Amanda's mother, told The CJN. "As far as I'm concerned Saul made the party."

Amanda shared this view. "Saul was great. He got everyone involved in dancing. He taught everyone the moves to Holiday by Madonna. He would stop the music and say, 'This is how you do it.'

"And he would really encourage people. He praised everyone when he gave out prizes for dancing. He tried to make everyone feel good about themselves. He would say, 'You were terrific,' or 'You did great.'"

Saul had "a real feel for the crowd," said David Wyman, Amanda's father. "We got plenty of positive feedback.

"He kept all of the adults going. They loved the music. He also showed great initiative in choosing intro-music for all the speakers."

On the same evening, just up the road from Amanda's party, Samantha Plested was celebrating her bat mitzvah with Adam Schachter from Mandell Entertainment running the show.

"He was fabulous," Samantha said. "He got everyone dancing. He made me get up to do YMCA and he told everyone, 'Me and Samantha have been practising the whole week.' He did it with me so I just copied him."

He was able to get the adults dancing by awarding a prize to the child who could bring the most adults to the dance floor, she said.

Her mother, Debbie Plested, said she was thrilled with the evening. "It was everything I had hoped it would be." She said she felt the DJ had been wonderful with the kids, especially with Samantha.

She was extremely pleased that she hired the dancers, she said. "They got everyone involved. There were no wallflowers with those dancers. Some of the kids – they were as young as four years old – were up there dancing. The kids would have stayed all night dancing."

Finally at midnight the parents had to beg her to stop the music so they could get their children to leave the party, Debbie said.

"If all of Mandell's guys are like Adam then Mandell deserves to be number 1 in Canada. He was absolutely fabulous."

Variety makes it easy to plan ahead

One-stop shops keep purchasing simple

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When you buy party supplies, the range of choices is exciting, but it can be bewildering. One way of having a lot of choice but simplifying your work is to get everything from a one-stop party supplier.

Granted, there may be times you want to buy at different stores, but the one-stop approach makes party purchasing easier, and fun besides. Both Stephane Abbat of It's My Party (469-4223) and Mel Grevler of Party Supply Depot (905-764-5457) recommend choosing a supplier big enough to stock everything you need. Bigger is better.

To choose among party suppliers, do as you would with any other business: start with word of mouth referrals, then check out a few competitors. Find a store you like, Abbat advises, then establish a long-term relationship.

If you save time by visiting a one-stop store, you give yourself a chance to enjoy the variety on the shelves. Your party shouldn't just be fun for the guests, you should enjoy planning it too. "If it's fun to plan," Abbat maintains, "it's fun to be at."

A good one-stop party store is customer friendly, set up so that it's easy to find your way around, and has an expert staff with constructive ideas. Expertise is crucial, says Abbat, because you don't buy party supplies every week and good staff will know the merchandise hands-on, not just by the catalog.

The supplier's inventory will be huge and constantly changing, with up to 15,000 items, 3,000 to 4,000 of which are replaced at any time.

Consequently, instead of one aisle with napkins, you may find one aisle with nothing but napkins of a single color. Such variety can be confusing, but expert, friendly staff make it a pleasure to choose from this abundance.

Variety makes it easier to plan ahead, too. Your supplier should have things for every holiday in the year. When buying for a summer lawn party, for instance, you should be able to look, if you want to, at what's available for fall events.

Good staff, Abbat says, listen even to off-beat ideas; so don't hesitate to say what's on your mind. They help with unusual theme parties – say, if you want to do a winter theme in midsummer. If you come in stressed out from planning the party, they're patient.

Grevler believes in letting customers handle the merchandise. "A party store isn't a museum," he says. "Kids will play with anything that resembles a toy. And why not, as long as they don't do anything destructive? Letting them play with something could help sell it. After all, if your bar mitzvah boy comes along on your buying trip, he's actually an unofficial consultant."

Flexibility is the key

As to budget, Grevler holds to the time-honored maxim of balancing cost and quality. No quality store can offer the lowest prices for every item. In your budget, Abbat recommends flexibility. Staff should respect your spending guidelines, and must also be flexible. If you buy all your balloons there, maybe they can give you a reduction on tableware.

Remind yourself, as well, of points you'd consider in making any purchase. Usually, disposable items are cheaper; but it's often more economical to buy something durable. Discounts may seem to offer savings, but what good are cheap napkins, Abbat asks, if a few drops of liquid make them disintegrate?

Some savings are less obvious. If you're buying large quantities and need lots of time to choose, Grevler points out, free or inexpensive parking is an important bonus; and extra services like decorating can save you time and energy.

Grevler thinks honest advice is the best policy, even if it means you spend less at any one time. For a bar mitzvah, for example, he might advise you not to buy the most expensive cutlery. Money you save this way might go to something else in the same store, be saved from your overall budget, or even be spent elsewhere; but in any case, the store earns your goodwill.

And, Grevler and Abbat would agree, it's goodwill that makes you want to come back.

Why buy when you can rent

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Your guests will sit comfortably all evening in chairs covered by Chair Decor Etc. (905-731-9217).

Mary Bien, who owns the company with Phyllis Rich, specializes in taking ordinary chairs and making them look extraordinary. "We have 14 different styles of covers including full and half covers. We have something to fit every chair and every budget," she says.

For a formal wedding, says Bien, she may cover the dinner chairs in brocade, damask, satin or cotton. "The cover always fits the chair perfectly. We will never recommend a cover if we feel it is not right for the chair. We can work around most chair sizes. We have worked at most hotels and banquet halls and we have an idea which chair size is where."

Guests feel good sitting in covered chairs, she says, because they are slightly padded and they are always clean. "Our covers are laundered, dry cleaned and pressed after every use."

Not only does it feel good, Bien stresses, a covered chair looks great. "It creates an elegant atmosphere to see the guests sitting on such classic chairs.Accents such as bows, bands, rosettes, braiding or cording really brighten up the room. Often, we coordinate the room with the bridesmaid dresses.

"We design all the covers, which are made in Toronto, ourselves. The fabrics are bought in the Orient and Europe."

While buying in the Orient, she says, she also brought over a lot of new accessories to enhance the table setting. "When clients call, we invite them to our showroom. We either show them tables that we have set up, or we custom design a setting. A complete table could include coordinating napkin rings or show plates which are placed under the dinner plate. Accents like that really put the finishing touch on a table."

Higgins Party Rentals (252-4050) carries everything you need for a party."We have tables, chairs, dishes, glasses, staging – even a dance floor," says John Higgins, one of five family members who run the 16-year-old business.

Chairs come in different types, including fold-up chairs, ballroom chairs in gold or black, or wooden chairs with padded seats. "A room full of gold chairs literally makes a room glow," says Higgins.

His china and cutlery also cover every taste, from formal to casual. "Our multi-colored china is great for an afternoon luncheon, and the best thing about it is that it does not look rented."

Each dish, he says, comes sterilized and wrapped in shrink wrap, and customers leave them dirty. "People are so stressed out when they make a party. By renting the dishes, they are leaving a major part of the party to us. We help them decide how many they need, and we will even work with the caterer or event coordinator in setting up the room."

Table coverings, says Higgins, also come in a multitude of colors, fabrics and designs. "We have plain cloths, as well as damask, brocades and lamés. We even carry chiffon and leopard cloths."

He invites party-givers to visit Higgins' new 25,000-square-foot showroom in Etobicoke. "If they call in advance, we will get some ideas over the phone and have some set tables waiting from them."

Another advertising rental place is Chair-Man Mills (391-0400).

Desserts: saving the best for last

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The dessert may come last, but it is certainly not least in importance, especially at a simchah. No matter how good the main course tastes, the piece de resistance usually comes at the end of the meal.

Many caterers prepare the main course and appetizers as well as the desserts, but others rely on companies that specialize in sweet table goodies and centrepiece desserts.

One dessert company is Richman's Kosher Bakery (636-9710) at 4119 Bathurst St., a 1997 winner of The Liberal Reader's Choice Award for best bakery. Along with its many breads, Richman's specializes in a wide assortment of pareve desserts.

"We've been known as a place for bar mitzvah cakes," said bakery owner Jonah Libman, whose grandfather was also a baker. "But we also make fantastic wedding cakes, tortes, petit fours and tarts, and we provide the cream for many of the mousses."

Traditionally, wedding cakes were fruit cakes, but Libman only does one such cake a year, he said. "Now the sky is the limit. People choose whatever they want on the inside of the cake, such as hazelnut, chocolate fudge or chocolate mousse. The outside of the cake is decorated like a traditional wedding cake."

The three-tier wedding cake is still the most popular design, he said, but cakes with staggered tiers are growing in popularity.

He praised the skills of the Richmond Bakery cake designer who "does beautiful work and has years of experience."

Wedding cakes are as much a part of the decor as they are a dessert because they are often the head table centrepiece Libman said.

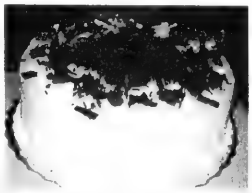
"We like to say that our wedding cakes taste as good as they look."

He noted that bar/bat mitzvah cakes come in all kinds of shapes; he recently did a cake in the shape of a piano and one as a basketball court, to go along with the themes of the respective parties.

He said the most common shapes of bar/ bat mitzvah cakes are Torah scrolls and tablets or books. Half-and-half cakes – one layer chocolate, one layer vanilla – tend to satisfy every sweet tooth.

He advised people to buy the proper size cake for the candle-lighting or flag ceremony. "You don't want to have an undersized cake."

Another company offering luscious desserts is Sweet York Desserts(783-4293) the dessert division of Caterers York, the caterers at Pride of Israel and Beth Tzedec synagogues. The company provides cakes to many synagogues and hotels



Cake by Richman's

Sweet York, now operating for 15 years, was established because catering company co-owners Sharon Firestone and Bill Batista felt there were not enough "good quality pareve desserts" and they also wanted to custom design wedding cakes and other special occasion cakes, Firestone said.

Cake designer Linda Thomas custom-designs "spectacular" cakes which can come in a variety of flavors – carrot, lemon, mocha, and chocolate mousse, to name a few, and bar/bat mitzvah cakes can be coordinated with a theme or color scheme, she said.

According to Firestone, some frequently requested desserts from Sweet York include "the best chocolate chip cookies," chocolate mousse torte, chocolate pecan flan, concord, and a variety of fresh fruit flans. For sweet tables the company prepares an assortment of mini-pastries, squares, cookies, and 9-inch cakes.

She said desserts go in and out of fashion. Biscotti, an Italian cookie, similar to mandel broit-which is popular these days, as are apple desserts. "Fruit generally is more in vogue because there is a trend to lighter and healthier eating."

To add a light refreshing dessert after the main course of a simchah one may want to use fresh fruit sorbet, said Beverley Golden, spokesperson for Metropolitan Ice Cream (245-1335). The company, founded in 1984, produces gourmet hand-packed, kosher ice-cream.

She noted that all Metropolitan gourmet ice cream and fruit sorbets are made from fresh raw ingredients. "There are no artificial flavors, colors or extracts and only all natural vegetable stabilizers are used."

The company serves both the retail market – you'll find Metropolitan ice cream in the freezer of most of grocery chains and fine food retailers – as well as the hospitality industry which includes golf clubs, hotels, restaurants and caterers, Golden said.

"We work closely with all the Jewish caterers."

The company boasts more than 150 different flavors, among them fruit sorbets, she said. "We were one of the first companies to do fresh fruit sorbets."

She said the sorbets are not only fat free but they're also made without dairy. Some of the flavors offered include blends of tropical fruits such as strawberry, kiwi, and banana, and orange, peach, and mango. "Designer flavors" can be made to accommodate customers' needs, she added.

Another kosher specialty food place is Chocolate Charm (787-4256).

The joy of giving

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Choosing a gift is often a challenge. In fact, sometimes it's not just a challenge, but a frustration.

But there are ways of turning this frustration to pleasure. To begin with, consider what a gift is: a tangible object that symbolizes what someone means to you. It should reflect the recipient's values and tastes, and at the same time show that you share those values.

Don't choose from a category you know nothing about, even though your friend or relative is interested in it. Why suffer the letdown, say, of buying a book for someone who likes mysteries – only to discover that they have that title already or don't like that author?

Instead, think of an interest or liking you share with the recipient, then choose from that category.

You can also benefit from knowing about current trends in gift buying, which may help you find what you want among the huge range of choices in the stores.

Lori Barzakay and Stacey Dombrowski of Fancy That! (905-669-5559) and Miriam Faivish of Elegant Sterling (256-1098) have observed that gift buyers are becoming more demanding. They're more budget-conscious, they want better quality and service, and presentation matters more, too.

People are buying crafted gifts made by artists or unique things with a personal touch, not seen in every store. They want to find a gift so special, Barzakay says, that when the recipient's friends see it, they ask where it came from, then go a step further and call the store itself. This compliments the giver and the retailer.

Most people aren't artists who craft one-of-a-kind gifts. As Barzakay points out, though, you can make a gift unique by customizing it.

This desire for uniqueness fits with Faivish's observation that people aren't giving money as much as they used to. But it too can be spent in more personalized ways, like gift certificates or bridal registries. The registry offers the added advantage of letting someone with a modest budget contribute to a more lavish present.

Durability is another factor. People enjoy receiving gifts like crystal, china, even furniture, that last for years, decades or generations. Sterling silver, as Faivish points out, is an excellent instance of a durable gift.

Being malleable, silver can be shaped to any form or style, contemporary or traditional, ornate or austere. It matches any occasion or setting, formal or casual. It can be polished to look new, no matter how old, and can usually be mended without leaving marks. It has significance for Judaica too: objects like menorahs and tzedakah boxes are commonly made of silver.

Also, as a precious metal, silver's value tends to increase. Despite wear and tear, an ancient silver service is usually worth more than it was in the year it left the silversmith's. What's more, it's now affordable, no longer costing hundreds of dollars.

"Functional, but fun" is a guideline for many gift buyers. Barzakay names examples like whimsically- shaped salt and pepper shakers, which are conversation pieces and useful as well.

"Functional" is also the watchword in oven-to-table items strong enough to withstand oven heat, but pleasing enough in design to share the table with fine china.

On the other hand, Barzakay acknowledges, some people prefer gifts that have no purpose other than fun or beauty. Does someone you care for like to watch fish, for example, as long as they don't have to feed them?

Would they like a bowl of glass fish that actually swim?

In sum, there's almost no limit to the range of choices. And if you go about it the right way, not only will your friend or relative enjoy the gift you choose. You'll enjoy making the choice, too.

Bringing people a high-energy simchah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Paramount Productions (905-508-8530) specializes in full-scale, high-end party productions.

Willie Kozma, who bought the company when it was called Paramount Sound, says he changed the company's focus in order to bring people "a high energy dance party."

Paramount's interactive show, says Kozma, is enhanced by a state of the art sound and lighting system.

"Guests are surrounded by multi-colored light beams and pulsating patterns, all set to the rhythmic sounds on the dance floor. We offer lighting ranging from simple colored floor lighting to suspended ceiling trusses loaded with intelligent lighting effects and state-of-the-art lasers."

Special effects also "make the party special. Light clouds of mist may float across the dance floor, or showers of confetti might rain from the ceiling. We always do something to make the party memorable.

"Our number 1 objective is to make each party different. When clients meet with us, they come to our 4,000-square-foot, high-tech facility and we discuss our packages and services. Our offices are geared to make the client comfortable so that they can decide how to incorporate our product into their simchah. When deciding on a theme, we always encourage input from the guest of honor. It is their party."

Doing the unconventional thing

Kozma, inspired by New York and Los Angeles parties, says he always tries to do the unconventional thing. "Rather than the standard entrance by the bar or bat mitzvah, we may do an opening number with dances. We bring in the boy or girl and they dance with our dancers.

"Once a month, all our dancers meet for a rehearsal, and during that time, the kids come in and practise the simple steps in their opening routine. We have another rehearsal one hour before the party. When the party actually starts, the dancers come out in costume to reflect the theme of the evening, and then the guest of honor is brought out. Laser lighting is used to enhance the routine. It makes for a spectacular opening."

Dancers change their costumes to reflect the theme of the dance routine. "For a disco set, they wear sequinned outfits with feather boas; during a neon nights set, they dress in neon costumes and colored wigs. We use a lot of black light so the colors really stand out. The hip hop set has the dancers in streetwear – overalls and backward baseball caps."

Partying it up. [Howard Levitt Photography]

At the conclusion of the party, Kozma says, they break into a horah medley to end the party on a traditional note. "Dancers circulate throughout the tunes to make sure that people are taking part."

He concedes that it is a challenge to keep the interest of 13-year-olds and he makes sure that there is always something going on. "When the kids finish eating, we run games and contests for them until the adults are through. Then we begin the party again."

Paramount's basic package, which can be built upon, always includes the disc jockey, MC, light show, dancers and prizes.

Caricatures evoke an affectionate smile

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When buying a gift for someone special, we often want to give our friend or relative something with the personal touch and dedication of art.

Looking for a gift with this kind of special touch? What about a personal portrait? Let Jack Risenman of Kartoons 'N Prints (226-4457) make an affectionate cartoon portrait.

A gift such as this can fit many occasions and settings. Think, for example, of your parents on their 50th wedding anniversary, or of a bar or bat mitzvah portrait showing the boy or girl in a favorite activity. And for decades after the big day, this portrait will be treasured as a permanent memento.

Risenman has been making cartoon portraits since he was a student, when he drew fellow students and staff for fun. When he entered the working world, he kept the hobby up. Since he retired, word of mouth referrals have helped him turn his hobby into a full-time career.

These portraits are worlds away from your typical caricature, which usually shows a certain malice, or at least a desire to laugh at someone. Risenman's work is full of good feeling, meant to evoke an affectionate smile. He focuses on the features that make a person unique, that will be recognized and loved by friends and family.

Among his sources of inspiration are the kinds of benign, fun-loving popular art many of us grew up with: the magazine cover paintings of Norman Rockwell; and comic strips full of amiable characters like Walt Kelley's Pogo or Al Capp's Li'l Abner.

Jack Risenman of Kartoons 'n' Prints.

His main motivation, he says, is the fun of doing the work. In fact, he doesn't even call it work; he likes it too much.

The portrait can show the face or the whole body, and a scene of choice; the only limit is your imagination. Newlyweds on a Mexican honeymoon, for example, can be portrayed in sombreros and serapes; or a medical graduate could be wearing a white smock and a stethoscope. The name can appear and the star of the picture can be shown quoting a favorite saying or expression.

Risenman also takes art's practical side seriously. He was a teacher of technical studies and loves art forms, such as silkscreen, which require expert command of materials. He taught communications too, covering subjects like the differences between magazine and newspaper cartoons.

The portrait he provides is in acrylic paints, 18 in. x 24 in., and set on a 30 in. x 40 in. board. Room is left at the sides and bottom so that friends and family can sign. The artwork only, not the surrounding area, is coated with vinyl to preserve it. (You can have T-shirts done too, on special request.)

The whole process takes three to 3½ weeks; so book well ahead. Good work can't be rushed. Allow yourself time to chat and decide about theme, objects and colors. Risenman likes to get enough feedback so he can give you exactly what you want.

He knows from experience that most of us have a problem sitting still for long periods and he won't ask anyone to sit more than five or six minutes. Rather than try to record every detail, Risenman focuses on essential features. If you want the present to be a surprise, he'll work from a photo.

Kartoons 'n Prints brings to mind an old story, about a Dutch woodcarver named Hans Vrill. He made his living by carving toys and figures for children; over his shop door, there hung a carved, brightly painted sign: "Hans Vrill – Never Worked and Never Will." He liked his trade too much to call it work. And that's how it is with Risenman.

Caterers on the lookout for innovative kosher food

A sweets table prepared by Peter Graben.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Toronto caterers now offer much more than what most people think of as traditional Jewish fare.

"We are always on the lookout for innovative kosher food that is lighter in style," says Walter Vaz, general manager of Peter Graben Fine Foods Inc. (510-1818).

Graben, who recently celebrated his 30th year in business, specializes in keeping up with trends in the food industry.

"Our menus include Thai, Chinese, Asian and a wealth of other cuisines," Vaz says. "A luncheon may include such dishes as drunken mushroom and sherry soup or four tomato salad with fresh herbs served with a pesto vinaigrette dressing and accompanied by spicy eggplant chips. A fish meal could consist of maple glazed fresh fillet of Atlantic salmon marinated in Ontario maple syrup, then grilled."

Graben realizes that hors d'oeuvres are a favorite part of any meal. Guests always look forward to his Thai salad rolls with a sweet dipping sauce; smoked salmon sushi, vegetable sushi and California rolls with a soy dipping sauce; beef tenderloin on toast rounds with tarragon sauce; or Graben's homemade pate on focaccia crusts.

When the Chinese pancake is served, guests choose from an assortment of bite-sized pieces of chicken or beef, accompanied by slivered cucumbers, green onions, bean sprouts and hoisin sauce, all enfolded in freshly made Chinese crepes and topped with plum sauce, lychee nuts, sliced almonds or sesame seeds.

Graben, whose list of venues include Casa Loma, the Royal Ontario Museum, the Estates of Sunnybrook, the McMichael Art Gallery, the Four Seasons Hotel, the Sheraton Centre Hotel, the Royal York Hotel and several synagogues including Beth Tikvah, Holy Blossom and Beit Rayim, realizes that a caterer's job goes beyond cooking and serving food.

"We offer a complete custom event. We sit down with clients on day one and decide where, how, and when. Most people have a fairy tale in their head when they come to the caterer. So they tell us, and then we give them their options," says Vaz.

Delicious

"We can literally walk people through the whole event, from deciding on decor and props, music, party favors, rentals and liquor and wine services. We hire only trained professionals to run, control and manage all of our functions and we have a brigade of trained, certified chefs cooking all of our cuisines."

Victor Alloul, who opened Fifth Avenue Caterers (905-763-8211) in September, specializes in home parties. "We bring in the burners and our own utensils and put together a pasta bar, Chinese or Mexican food – anything the client wants.

"The basic Chinese meal," says Alloul, "is chicken, beef, spring rolls, stir fry vegetables and Chinese rice, and then everything is custom cooked from there. Guests can choose what they want and how they want it made."

Shabbat dinners, which consist of soup, salad, chicken, vegetable and dessert come with full instructions, in a container that is ready to be popped in the oven.

Alloul says he tries to keep his cooking away from the mainstream. "We follow cooking trends and then we make them kosher. We have found a company in Quebec that makes kosher truffle and hazelnut oil, and is currently waiting for its kosher supervision. I always keep my eyes open for new foods."

He has kept up with the Asian influence in cooking by finding a kosher hoisin sauce, sesame oil and lemon grass. Cooking with maple has become quite popular and Alloul now lists maple infused chicken amongst his specialties.

"There is no reason at all why kosher food has to be limited. I hear about something, I look for it, and then I play with the dish until it is right."

He also runs a restaurant in Reena's new Toby and Henry Battle Centre in Thornhill, which is open for lunch Monday to Friday, and dinner and Thursday and Sunday.

Both caterers are kosher under COR.

Other advertising kosher caterers are: Caterers York/Sweet York Desserts (783-4293); Le Parc and Beverley Hills Caterers (789-7246); Malmar Fine Foods & Catering (638-0091); Prestige Fine Cuisine (782-3231); Rose Lazar Catering Services (633-0344); Sam Firestone Caterers (782-8022); Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers (738-6880).

Now you can cook just like mom

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

My mother is a wonderful cook, but you won't find any cookbooks in her house. The truth of the matter is that she considers them superfluous. After all these years of laboring in a kitchen and pleasing her family with hearty and delicious meals, her cooking is an eclectic blend of immense knowledge and quick silver intuition.

Most of us aren't as erudite or as lucky. We need to consult and pore over recipes. In short, cookbooks are our culinary salvation.

The cookbooks under review may not transform you into a peerless chef, but they will doubtless improve your skills and enlarge your repertoire.

Master Chefs Cook Kosher (Raincoast Books) proves yet again that the possibilities in kosher cooking are virtually limitless. The author, Judy Zeidler, is the hostess of Judy's Kitchen, which appears on the Jewish TV Network, as well as the co-owner of two restaurants in southern California.

In this lavishly illustrated volume, 37 prominent chefs who've been on her show meld traditional kosher cuisine with international influences – French, Italian, Mexican and so on – for recipes that are au courant and irresistible.

Consider Thomas Keller's warm smoked salmon with Italian potato gnocchi; Joyce Goldstein's mushroom and hazelnut soup; Evan Kleiman's marinated white fish with pine nuts; Stephan Pyles' tomato salsa; Bradley Ogden's prune fritters with lemon and orange curd; Phillipe Jeanty's olive and feta vinaigrette; or Mary Sue Milliken's Mexican bread pudding.

Kosher food tends to be filling, but Harriet Roth's Deliciously Healthy Jewish Cooking (Plume) solves that problem and eliminates the guilt.

Roth, a former director of the Pritikin Longevity Centre Cooking School, shows a reader how to trim fat and cholesterol, decrease sodium and use alternative ingredients to create comfort food.

The book is organized around the Sabbath, major holidays, appetizers, soups, salads, noodles and grains, vegetables, fish, poultry, beef, lamb and veal, and, yes, desserts.

The Passover Table (HarperCollins), by Susan Friedland, presents more than 40 recipes, both traditional and modern, for celebrating the holiday and coping with seders.

Friedland, the director of cookbook publishing at HarperCollins, offers reliable versions of classics (gefilte fish and pot roast) and contemporary fare (chicken tangine and Turkish sweet and sour artichokes).

Pasta lovers will appreciate Joie Warner's No-Cook Pasta Sauces (Raincoast). Her premise is: why cook if you don't have to? In this spirit, she divulges the secret of whipping up easy pasta sauces ready to eat in minutes without even turning on a burner.

With only a handful of flavorful ingredients such as olives, tomatoes, citrus, cheese and herbs, you can cook up a storm.

It doesn't get better than this.

Soups are to meals what nails are to home construction: absolutely vital. If you agree, you'll be swept over by Marguerite Patten's Soup (Raincoast).

Patten, a distinguished British food writer whose books have sold millions of copies, has soups for every conceivable occasion – clear soups, fish soups, meat soups, vegetable soups, cold soups, fruit soups and poultry soups.

The recipes are simple and to the point.

Mediterranean food is all the rage nowadays, and for good reason. It's light and fragrant and glows with color and texture.

In Mediterranean Cooking (Raincoast), Matthew Kenney and Sam Gugino take traditional recipes from countries like Greece, Turkey and Morocco and adapt them to North American tastes.

The result is gratifying. How about a baked squash soup with nuts and spices? Or eggplant puree with yogurt and mint? Or a Tunisian couscous salad? Or lemon chicken with pine nuts and green olives?

Trust me, you won't be disappointed.

Phil Bloom launches Special Event Architects

For over 30 years, Phil Bloom, master party planner and special event consultant, has dazzled Montreal partygoers. Starting in June 1998, Bloom will bring his expertise to Toronto clients. In conjunction with Audrey Hyams Romoff, owner of OverCat Communications, a Toronto-based special events and public relations company, Bloom will continue to build on his illustrious career which includes the planning of over 5,000 events.

From an "Arabian Night" wedding to a product launch in an airplane fuselage, Bloom has built a reputation for creating unforgettable events, including Hyams Romoff's sweet sixteen — a "disco" themed party thrown at the height of Saturday Night Fever. The two met again recently when Hyams Romoff contacted Bloom about a product launch she was planning in Montreal. "I had been thinking about expanding into the Toronto market for a long time," said Bloom. "I am really looking forward to this new opportunity."

Special Event Architects will offer a full range of party and event planning services, from concept to conclusion. "We take a germ of an idea and create a fantasy," said Bloom.

Past "fantasies" created by Bloom include a "Barn" Mitzvah where guests gathered round a campfire to eat hot dogs and beans, a corporate affair where he excavated an executive's back lawn to create an underground ballroom and a sweet sixteen where the entire cast of the television show Fame was flown in to perform.

Bloom began his career as the owner of two flower shops where he became known for his theatrical arrangements. He was soon being asked to consult on food, music and entertainment. When a cousin asked him to create a "total" party, a new facet of his career was launched. The circus theme featured tightrope walkers balancing a few feet over the guests' heads as they ate dinner.

In addition to event planning, Bloom runs a "private entertainment facility" known as The Living Room in downtown Montreal. The 6,000 sq. ft. space can accommodate events for 50—500 people. He has also recently begun hosting Dr. Party, a live, weekly radio call-in show on a popular Montreal station, where he shares his expertise and offers advice.

"Both Audrey and myself feel that Special Event Architects is an accurate description of the services we provide, since we literally build the event," adds Bloom. "Regardless of the size or type of the event, it will be memorable."

Harvey Seigel of the Fabulous Harvey Seigel Band.

Bands help set the tone of the party

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

At a party, the music sets the tone so it's best to book the best band you can find.

Shelley Miller of the Shelley Miller Band (481-1034) and Harvey Seigel of the Fabulous Harvey Seigel Band (782-9202) offer some pointers on how to choose a band.

Don't talk prices or essentials on the phone, he says. Arrange to meet as soon as you know the date, then talk in person.

The day you know when your event will take place, urges Miller, pick up the phone. Prime dates go fast. Then have two meetings before the big day. The first is to get acquainted. The other, about two months before the party, is to plan the agenda, make song lists, and work out details such as special dances. For a big event, you may need a third meeting led by the consultant.

Do not trust someone who agrees too easily with you, warns Seigel. Spend a couple of hours and be sure he understands you. Know what you want, but be flexible. Trust the band leader's knowledge and experience, and respect someone with the courage to tell you if an idea won't work. Let him tailor the band and music to your plans.

If you want material that is not in the band's repertoire, give them lead time to learn it.

Be specific about the songs you like, urges Miller, but take guests' tastes into account too. Remember that different parts of the party need different music. The Beatles, for example, are great for quiet times like dinner but won't always get people up to dance. Even dance music, Seigel says, should not be so loud your guests can't talk.

The leader, says Miller, has to work well with the caterer, consultant and other professionals at a simchah, both to give and take direction.

You're hiring both a leader and performers, Miller reminds you. They have to be talented and sincere, and at the same time play to an audience. Just as important, they must be reliable and organized.

The band, Seigel says, has to enjoy the event along with you and your guests. They have to be dedicated and in synch with each other.

Choose a band, Seigel says, with a solid core group of musicians. The leader should be able to add people as needed, changing size from a single keyboard to a three- or four-piece dinner ensemble, to a nine-piece dance orchestra.

After 25 year of experience, Miller knows that musicians perform better if they get occasional breaks – to rest, as well as to adjust the mood from one part of an event to another. There is a big contrast between dinner music and dance rhythms.

Get a band with its own backup equipment, Miller recommends. You don't want to hear about problems with mikes or speakers. As Seigel points out, if there's a delay in serving food, it's the band that has to keep everybody happy until the glitch is fixed.

The client and the band leader, Miller and Seigel say, are looking for a fantastic party where the music will be remembered. Find the band that will give you this and you will work well together.

Videos go hand in hand with photos

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

A video is the only way to capture the true feeling of a party, says Darren Sager, owner of D.M.S. Video (905-881-7677).

"A video relives a dance, captures a speech and shares a special moment. It films events that hosts might miss at their own party. The videographer sees things that people can cherish forever.

"It cannot replace a still picture, of course, because you cannot take a video to work or hang it on the wall. But on the other hand, you cannot pop a picture into the VCR and have the party right in your living room. The video and the picture go hand in hand."

Although Sager will provide videotaping without editing, "90 percent of our clients want an edited version. This includes a photographic introduction of the child growing up and background music. Special effects, such as page turning or water rippling, are always done with an emphasis on class."

He has been a videographer for 12 years, and he usually knows what to include in the edited version of the video, but clients are welcome to sit in on the editing process.

"If that is not feasible – the process takes about 15 hours – we always have a footage review night to see certain parts."

Sager stresses that everything is captured on film. "Editing should not be done at the party. It needs to be done in a calmer environment when I can reflect on the party."

When filming a wedding, says Sager, the cameraman and his assistant arrive one hour before the signing of the ketubah and bedecking of the bride and stays until the end of the evening.

"We're there, but we're never in the way. There are no wires or tripods, and we use a 20-watt camera light so no one is shocked by the light.

His digital equipment is state of the art, Sager says. "Picture quality is good and skin tone is accurate. These are things an amateur videographer usually knows nothing about."

He says it is never too early to book a videographer. "I have bookings into the middle of 2000. When clients come in, we discuss a budget and then we work from there. No matter how much the customer is prepared to spend, however, they always get a professional video, something that will keep memories alive forever."

Party locales vary greatly, from your recreation room at home to hotels and convention centres, and the number of businesses offering different kinds of venues is huge.

Chandra Narayan of Mad Hatter's Tea Party (905-475-2854) and Howard Orfus of The Rinx (410-RINX) operate specialized party venues for kids of different ages.

Mad Hatter's Tea Party specializes in parties for kids aged four to 12. It offers a present-opening room, a maze, a pillow fight room, a water room, a gym, face paint, party food and candy grab bags.

Rinx, for a slightly older age group, offers whirlyball, ice skating, in-line skating, video and laser tag. Its banquet room, which can seat 200 people, is elegantly decorated with wall sconces, carpeting and imitation trees.

Both have suggestions for picking a locale, however, that make sense for any age group and type of party.

The things you think of in dealing with any professional, such as courtesy, rapport and readiness to minimize your stress, are important in this case too, Orfus points out.

A good professional respects your budget range, for example, but you need some flexibility too.

Before you choose a venue, consider what kind of function you're having. Who will be attending, and how many? What is the age and taste range? What mood and atmosphere do you want? What time of year will it be? What size and what kind of layout go with your party?

If you're building a surprise into the entertainment, for example, you may want unobtrusive doorways and rooms where people can wait for their cue without being inadvertently spotted by your guests.

If it's a summer event, you may prefer a venue with outdoor green space.

Orfus says he places high value on how well the venue is maintained. You might prefer a dignified ambience like that of some older hotels, for example, but the best older venues are as well maintained as the newer ones, and offer up-to-date amenities.

To find a locale that matches your event as closely as possible, you need to do some research, Narayan says, and study the options. For every function, there are hundreds of possibilities and unless you have a clear idea what you want, the choices can be confusing.

Once you have some idea how much work is involved, decide what you want to do personally and what you want to delegate. No matter how much you delegate, you'll be surprised what you still have to do, planning and organizing, setting priorities, making decisions and drawing up schedules.

One major advantage of using a specialized venue is that "little things" like decoration and cleanup are looked after.

Pick a place that offers something for everyone, advises Orfus, with everything there from games to dishes. Look for a locale that takes into account the fact that every age group needs a different form of entertainment. Even if you bring entertainers in, it's better for there to be something on site as well.

Many events take place in two different places, Orfus observes. A bar mitzvah, for example, may be in a shul on Saturday and in a banquet hall on Sunday. Weddings often move from one place to another. Make sure you plan this aspect of the logistics carefully, he says.

Come in and make face to face contact first, advises Narayan. Then much of the planning can be done on the phone, though more meetings in person are welcome.

Major decisions, however, should be made face to face, Orfus says.

To save both work and worry for a kids' party, Narayan recommends looking for a venue with a completely supervised program, where all you need do is drop your kids off and pick them up. And to ensure the kids have fun, use a venue that's designed for them.

Book at least one month in advance. There's no such thing as too early, Orfus and Narayan agree. Book at least five to six months ahead, a year if you can. If you're going to choose the best venue you can find, make sure you get it.

Resolutions on Israel stir lively debate

While most of the other 30-odd resolutions – covering a wide array of subjects from social justice issues to Jewish education to combating hate crimes and Christian missionary activity – passed easily, two resolutions on Israel proved to be quite contentious. One resolution calling upon Congress to urge the Canadian government "to assist in facilitating the Middle East peace process by encouraging the parties and by offering constructive ideas in support of negotiations toward a permanent political settlement" passed with the support of only two-thirds of the delegates. Some dissenting delegates objected to the resolution on the grounds that it was unnecessary. They argued that the Canadian government was already doing what it could to help along a largely moribund peace process at the moment. Others objected to what they viewed as interference in Israeli political affairs.

CJC Plenary

That same argument was used against two resolutions on religious pluralism in Israel. There were a couple of unsuccessful efforts to amend the resolution calling on Congress to "urge the government of Israel to ensure the legal and social equality of all Jews in Israel." The amendment would have replaced the word "Jews" with the word "people." But the resolution passed unamended.

Additional resolutions from the floor were also passed after some debate. The first two dealt with the B'nei Menashe, a group of people in India and Burma who claim to be descendants of the Tribe of Menashe.

One resolution called on Congress to support the rescue of 211 B'nei Menashe youngsters while the other called on Congress to establish a fact finding mission on the whole subject of the B'nei Menashe. The resolutions were passed with some changes in wording.

Near the end of the session, some student delegates attempted to introduce a pair of resolutions demanding that the new president of Congress appoint a young Jewish adult – defined subsequently as a full-time student or recent graduate – to one of four seats on the CJC's national officers' committee. The students also called for the appointee to be nominated or elected "by a body of his or her peers."

After some discussion, the students agreed to withdraw the second resolution and reword the first to define a young adult as anyone between 18 and 35. With yet another change in wording, the resolution passed and the session was adjourned.

however, did not appear to jibe with the fact that the Jewish community and Israeli diplomatic offices were aware of the possible closure before the Ma'ariv story.

David Cooper, a press officer with the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa, acknowledged, contrary to Shiron, that closing the Israeli Consulate in Montreal was "under consideration" and that he "heard about it the other day."

FEDERATION CJA president Stanley Plotnick, similarly, said he was aware of the possibility of the Israeli Consulate closing down about a day and a half before the Ma'ariv report appeared.

Thomas Hecht, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region, also said he knew about the possible closure before the Israeli story appeared, after getting word from Israeli Consul General in Montreal Daniel Gal.

Also contrary to Shiron, the Jewish community responded last week as if the closure of the consulate was a virtual fait accompli.

In Winnipeg, on May 26, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) national officers expressed their "deepest concern" over the possible closure of the consulate and urged in a motion to Israel's Foreign Ministry that any such decision "be reversed immediately."

In Montreal the same evening, Hecht, Plotnick and officials from Israeli-based institutions met to devise a strategy to block the closure, Hecht said.

"We have taken all necessary measures to ensure this does not happen," he said.

"If this has been decided upon, it is a decision that should be rescinded, both in the interests of Israeli diplomacy, its worldwide diplomatic strategy, and also on behalf of the Jewish community."

Hecht quoted from a letter to Israeli Foreign Ministry officials in which he stated: "The Israeli Consulate in Montreal has always been the symbol of recognition by Israel of the uniqueness of Quebec in the Canadian federation, as a result of the particular political and bilingual characteristics."

It was Hecht's opinion that the Foreign Ministry, "probably in its wisdom – or lack thereof – decided in the closing of certain consulates.

"I think they did not take into account the reality and very special nature of the Montreal consulate."

Plotnick, like Hecht, voiced optimism that the consulate will not close.

"It ain't gonna happen," he said. "We are not going to allow it to happen. There is a plan in effect to reach out to the appropriate people and to change the decision."

Ironically, it appeared that the future of the consulate here was put in doubt after Israel rescinded a decision, some months back, to close the Israeli Consulate in Toronto.

The Ma'ariv story said that the decision at that time was reversed, "due to pressure of influential Jewish leaders."

Plotnick said the Montreal Jewish community "helped support Toronto's position." Asked if Toronto would do the same now, he replied, "Absolutely!"

Plotnick said closing the Israeli Consulate here, "would be a tragedy not only for the Montreal Jewish community, but it would be a tragedy for Israel."

He said he did not know whether the decision was "final," only that it may have been made at the "bureaucratic" level, but not yet at the "political" one.

"I guess [Israel's Finance Ministry] is going around trying to save money. [But] all major Diaspora communities have a major investment in the State of Israel and a great deal of affinity towards the State of Israel. Not opening a consulate is one thing, but closing a consulate has tremendous ramifications."

In Quebec City, Sylvain Simard, the minister for international relations who has visited Israel twice, said he was shocked and disappointed by the news that the Israeli Consulate might close.

While Simard understood Israel's budgetary constraints and noted that the decision to close the consulate is Israel's alone to make, he said doing so, "will give bad signals for our relations, which are so excellent now."

Asked if closing the consulate would actually damage Quebec-Israel relations, Simard replied:

"The word 'damage' is difficult to use in diplomatic terms, but what I can say is that it would give the signal that what we have built over the last years is not seen by the Israeli government as very important. This, in a sense, will hurt our relationship."

United Church reaches out

council, which meets every two or three years, and represents the church's 700,000-plus membership. But it is being greeted in Jewish circles as a major breakthrough.

"It's a quantum leap…a tremendous achievement," enthused Rabbi Reuven Bulka, chair of the religious and inter-religious affairs committee of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), which was consulted in the document's drafting. "It's a sincere, heartfelt and careful attempt to set up a new basis for the future."

Rabbi Bulka recalled the days in the 1960's when relations between Jews and the United Church were "horrible," due in part to vituperatively anti-Israel articles in the church's newspaper, the United Church Observer.

But this latest effort "opens up, in terms of honesty, a whole new chapter in inter-religious relations. This is the way to redress the past," Rabbi Bulka said in a telephone interview from Ottawa.

The report is "quite remarkable," and "hails a new stage in United Church-Jewish relations," said Karen Mock, director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights. "What's really significant about it is that it's written by Christians for Christians."

Mock is hopeful that the report will trigger changes in attitude, "which will ultimately affect behavior."

The document is an outgrowth of a petition the church's general council passed in 1988, in response to the case of Holocaust-denying teacher James Keegstra. It called on the church to confront Christian anti-Semitism and to mend fences with Jews.

In 1991, the church declined to apologize for its role in Canadian anti-Semitism, deciding instead to educate members about anti-Judaism in the Scriptures and anti-Semitism in general.

The resulting document is surprisingly candid and self-examining in places. It states plainly, for example, that "no other religion is as closely related to Christianity as Judaism. The Christian God is the God of Israel. Jesus and all the apostles were of Israel…the hope of Israel is the Christian hope too."

There is now "wide-ranging recognition that the church's rejection of Jews was an act of disobedience to God," the report adds.

Apart from imploring members to be "respectful" of Judaism, the report identifies and helps contextualize passages in the New Testament which have led to negative images of Jews.

For example, Jesus is often depicted in the Bible as a true Torah-believing and observant Jew, but sometimes as opposed to Judaism. The same applies, the report says, to the apostle Paul.

"The best data we have today," the report cautions, "suggest that neither rejected Judaism or their own Jewishness – quite the opposite. We should choose to interpret on that side of the dichotomy."

The document cites several other examples of Scriptures which may cast aspersions on the Jewishness of Jesus and his early followers. It admonishes adherents to err on the side of tolerance and respect for Jews.

"The development of anti-Judaism could not have been in the purpose of God. It certainly has no place in the church more than 50 years after the Holocaust," it states.

הכובשים החדשים של פראג- יהורם פירוצקי:

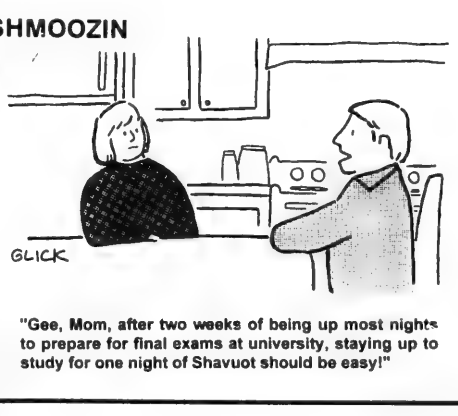
"זה לא אותו העמק, זה לא אותו הבית,
אתם אינכם, ולא תוכלו לשוב,
אז איך קרה, אז איך קרה ואיך קורה עדיין
שהחיטה צומחת שוב?"



"Gee, Mom, after two weeks of being up most nights to prepare for final exams at university, staying up to study for one night of Shavuot should be easy!"

Students close out a busy year on Montreal campus

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — One way to see how busy students were on campus as the CEGEP and university school year drew to a close, is to peruse Hillel's report for March and April.

The biggest news in the report prepared by director Steve Spodek seemed to be that Hillel last month held its first annual Student Awards Evening. It paid tribute to some of the leaders who work to keep students actively involved during the school year.

According to Spodek's report, Emmanuel Castiel, a past chair of the Hillel city-wide student executive, took note of the higher level of Jewish student activity during the 1997-98 year, and of the fact that the activities originated with the students themselves.

Current chair Andrew Elbaz stated that the city-wide executive "is a growing student body, filled with the most energetic, dedicated and passionate students."

In a way, Castiel's and Elbaz's remarks were echoed by McGill professor Gil Troy, who, in the report, "challenged the student leadership to encourage others to get involved" beyond the actual moment of graduation.

'Growing student body'

Tributes were paid, as well, to outgoing McGill Hillel president Amy Shore, who is heading back to her native Toronto.

Shore, who also sits on Hillel's international board of directors, said that at an international level, Hillel is "creating a Jewish renaissance, and Montreal Hillel is playing an important role.

"People are coming to us and asking to get involved in Hillel, and enthusiasm and involvement are at an all-time high."

For example, a fundraising raffle for Hillel programming across the city sold over 1,000 tickets, with the credit going to Tania Guindi, finance vice-president of Hillel's city-wide executive committee.

Other examples include a Passover Mimouna party that drew over 100 and a Centre Hillel cafe show party featuring former Montrealer and now French up-and-coming star Gad Elmaleh.

Or how about an earlier Purim party that drew over 400? Or the Wake-Up Tour concert with the Moshav Band that attracted over 1,000? (It was followed up by a "learning session" with over 100 taking part.)

All the above, just in March and April, not to mention several Jewish learning initiatives involving Rabbi Shlomo Atlan, Prof. Norma Joseph, Jason Lax (for the McGill portion of Holocaust Education Week), Purim and Passover events, and media interviews of students about Israel's 50th birthday.

This summer, the report said, Jewish students are being welcomed to Beaver Lake for Israeli folk-dancing, and the doors to Hillel are always open in cyberspace, at its award-winning Web site: [http://www.hillel.montreal.qc.ca/zionet.html].

Support group helps remove stigma of cancer

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — When Jessica Miller found out her 18-year-old daughter Sheryl had Hodgkin's disease, she had to practise saying cancer alone in a mirror before she could use the word in front of her daughter because the fact was just so hard to bear.

That was 18 years ago. For most of the time since, Miller has worked volunteerily with cancer patients and their families through Hope & Cope (H&C), a highly regarded support program at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH), founded by Sheila Kussner 17 years ago. Sheryl, now a mother of three and a lawyer, leads a Hope & Cope support group for young adults with cancer.

"If anyone had told me before my daughter's illness that I would be so involved with this type of work I would never have believed it," said Miller, a librarian by profession, who has just been named H&C president. She had previously never thought of herself as "helping" by nature, and, though her father died of cancer, she says, he never used the word or spoke of his illness from the time he was diagnosed until he died a month later.

Jessica Miller

While providing support is H&C's raison d'etre, Miller is determined to also remove the stigma still associated with cancer.

Nearly all of H&C's 130 volunteers have either had cancer or had a close relative with the disease. They are trained and guided by professional social workers in how to help those dealing with the physical, emotional and social effects of a diagnosis of cancer and its treatment.

"Sure it's emotionally draining, and some volunteers leave quickly realizing it's not for them. But many have been around for years, some from the beginning" she said.

"Sometimes when I come back from a clinic, I just have to have a quiet cup of coffee to calm down. Other people need to take a few months off."

The H&C's office is right next to the oncology department, and volunteers are at hand to greet those coming to the clinic.

H&C has separate support groups for young (18 to about 35) patients, older patients, relatives and friends, women newly diagnosed with breast cancer, and the bereaved.

Volunteers may also provide one-on-one support, as companions, hospital visitors, drivers to treatments, patient advocates. H&C, which is funded entirely by private donations (except for the use of its office), gives away wigs, turbans and prostheses, has a library of 1,000 books and cassettes, and publishes a newsletter.

Rita Fargnoli was 26 and married eight months when she was diagnosed with Hodgkin's disease in April 1994. She was reluctant to join a group, thinking it would be depressing and that she wouldn't fit into a group.

After her first meeting, she never missed another one through her two months of radiotherapy, six months of chemotherapy and six months in between. "I came out feeling wonderful. It was so encouraging. I had found people who were going through the same thing, with whom I could share feelings. As much as your family and friends are there for you, it's not the same as talking with people in the same situation."

A couple of months ago, Fargnoli became a group facilitator.

"It was time to move on. H&C had helped me; it was time to give something back. Also, it was time to stop focussing on myself and focus more on other people. Eventually, you have to let go of your own little worries."

The importance of mutual aid was obvious to Miller when her daughter was ill. "She desperately wanted to meet a Hodgkin's survivor who had got married and had children," she said. And as a parent, she is acutely aware of how devastating a cancer diagnosis in a child can be. Since then, she has "specialized" in working with mothers.

Miller noted that people often need more support after their treatment because they suddenly are on their own again after perhaps months of medical care. Relatives, too, are usually overlooked. "Everybody asks how's your husband (daughter, mother), but they never ask how are you doing? The family can be under tremendous stress."

H&C's philosophy is that everyone is a survivor from the day of their cancer diagnosis, and life should be lived to the full as it comes. Each year, a Cancer Survivors Day is held to "celebrate" with entertainment and refreshments, and a testimonial from someone who's beat cancer.

Program provides education on osteoporosis

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, North York General Hospital Seniors' Health Centre, Yee Hong Centre for Geriatric Care, along with Toronto Public Health, have jointly developed an education, nutrition and exercise wellness program for the growing number of seniors with age-related osteoporosis, a brittle bone disease that is the leading cause of hip fractures.

POWER (Promoting Osteoporosis Wellness Through Education, Exercise and Resources) is a model that can be adopted by other communities, say the organizers. Proctor & Gamble Inc. is providing the seed funding for the program.

By the year 2001, an estimated 31,000 people will be diagnosed with osteoporosis in Toronto. In Canada, the prevalence of this disease rises to one in four women and one in eight men over the age of 50.

Falls were found to be the leading cause of hospital admissions between 1990 and 1995 in North York, accounting for 87.3 percent of all injury-related admissions of seniors aged 65 years and older.

POWER program classes began in May at North York General Hospital Seniors' Health Centre and Yee Hong Centre for Geriatric Care. The Baycrest Centre classes will start in early June.

There is still space available in some classes. The program is specifically designed for seniors who have been diagnosed with osteoporosis.

For more information, call: Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, 785-2500, ext. 2636; Yee Hong Centre for Geriatric Care, 321-6679; or North York General Hospital Seniors' Health Centre, 756-1040, ext. 8036.

15 percent pullback rumored

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Word is spreading at the senior government level that the State Department expects the cabinet to authorize the IDF to withdraw from up to 15 percent of the West Bank.

A source coupled this demand to a warning from the United States that Secretary of State Madeleine Albright will publish the proposals made by American intermediaries, a move that one diplomat said would transform the current differences between Israel and the United States into "an open confrontation."

The source said the cabinet's acceptance of a pullback deemed adequate by the U.S. administration would be followed by President Bill Clinton convening a summit conference in Washington within the next two weeks or by the end of June with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

"I have absolutely no first-hand knowledge of any such deadline, except as speculated in the press," said David Bar-Ilan, the prime minister's director of communications. "I don't think it is wise to set deadlines or ultimatums. We're dealing here with questions of Israel's security and not with trivial matters," Bar-Ilan said.

New support for an IDF withdrawal from more than the nine percent minimum set by the cabinet earlier this year came from Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani.

"I believe there will be no solution other than a two-digit percentage point pullback," he said. "The peace process will continue and I have no doubt that The Third Way's stand on this issue at this moment is critical."

Kahalani's Third Way Party is a pivotal member of Netanyahu's coalition.

Asked to define his party's "red line" beyond which it will not remain in the coalition, Kahalani reportedly said it is the cessation of the peace process.

"In my opinion, this is quite close. I won't hold a pistol to the government's forehead, but it should be clear to all that whoever does not want to go on with the process cannot be with us."

Among the indications that intensive diplomatic activity is under way, is the presence in Washington of Netanyahu's foreign policy adviser, Uzi Arad, who was sent from Netanyahu's entourage in China to Washington for talks with U.S. officials. A senior official conceded that "even cabinet ministers" are unaware of the nature of Arad's mission.

Knesset bill aims to end direct election of PM

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The bill to abolish direct election of the prime minister, presented by Uzi Landau (Likud) and Yossi Beilin (Labor), passed preliminary reading in the Knesset 50-45, with one abstention.

Support for the bill crossed party lines, with many Likud and Labor MKs voting for it in what was seen as a rebellion of the back benchers against their party leaders, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak, both of whom are strongly against changing the direct election law.

Netanyahu, who tried to persuade Likud MKs by telephone from China not to support the bill, said there is no chance it will pass first reading.

He was echoed by senior figures from both Likud and Labor, who said it was doubtful the bill will get the required support of 61 MKs.

Eleven Likud members, including National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon and MKs Dan Meridor, Ze'ev Begin, Ehud Olmert, Ruby Rivlin, and Michael Kleiner – supported the bill.

Haim Ramon (Labor), who voted against the bill, said it was "the victory of the dinosaurs, the veterans of both parties and their mental heirs."

Most Likud and Labor MKs are in favor of abolishing direct elections, which are expected to reduce the power of the major parties even further in the next elections to the benefit of the smaller parties.

Netanyahu and Barak, however, are interested in preserving them, as they enable them to get the votes of people who do not necessarily support their respective parties.

Former prime ministers Peres and Yitzhak Shamir, founding members of the Council for Parliamentary Democracy, expressed deep satisfaction with the outcome of the vote.

'Islamic bomb' worries Israel

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Israeli policymakers are treading warily around the potential pitfalls posed for the Jewish state by recent nuclear tests by both India and Pakistan.

Analysis

While Israel shares the world's fears of a dangerous atomic arms race between India and Pakistan – fears heightened last week by the "retaliatory" nuclear tests set off by Pakistan – there are aspects and repercussions of the ominous conflict in the Indian subcontinent that create special challenges for Jerusalem.

Foremost among Israel's concerns is the longstanding fear of an "Islamic bomb" – particularly one in the hands of an extremist state like Iran or Libya.

Israel has long been concerned that in Pakistan's quest to achieve nuclear parity with its larger neighbor, it will turn – or has turned – to rich Muslim states for cash aid and, where available, for brainpower and technology transfers.

There have been scenarios under discussion here in which Libya or Iran request a quid pro quo for such help in the form of subsequent cooperation from Pakistan, also a Muslim country, that would in effect equip them with a finished weapon.

A variation on this scary prospect has Pakistani personnel, motivated by religious and pan-Islamic as well as mercenary considerations, participating in Muslim military action against Israel.

Israeli observers say the fear of Iran acquiring nuclear weapons is the foremost concern of the U.S. administration as well, and it accounts for the severity with which President Bill Clinton has reacted to India's move and to the recent Pakistani response.

These observers say the president is determined to demonstrate that nuclear proliferation will be painfully punished, in the hope that the lesson will be learned in Iran and Libya.

Beyond the Islamic spillover effect, however, Israel is troubled by two other ramifications of the stepped-up arms race on the subcontinent that could affect the Jewish state.

Israel, India and Pakistan are the only three countries that are widely believed to have a nuclear weapons capability who are not signatories to the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

In addition, all three countries have, for different reasons, adhered to a policy of deliberate vagueness in all public pronouncements connected to their nuclear capabilities.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu adhered closely to this long-standing policy. When, asked recently on American television for his reaction to the news that India had detonated five underground nuclear tests, he immediately reiterated that "Israel will not be the first state to introduce nuclear weapons into the Middle East."

The meaning of that statement? Make what you want of it, Netanyahu advised his questioners.

But with India, under its new Hindu nationalist government, boldly deciding to step out of the nuclear closet, and now Pakistan too, people here wonder how long Israel's option of nuclear vagueness will remain available.

There could be, as a consequence of the world's sudden new interest in the danger of proliferation, a reawakening of international pressure – on all three recalcitrants – to come clean and sign onto the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Israeli policymakers, regardless of their political affiliation, are almost unanimous in their belief that Israel cannot afford to relinquish the vagueness posture – at least as long as the Israeli-Arab conflict remains unresolved.

Indeed, in a readily understandable paradox, it is often the staunchest soft-liners on Israel's hawk-dove spectrum who are the toughest proponents of Israel jealously guarding its nuclear capacity as the surest guarantee of its security.

These doves believe that all progress made in the peace process rests ultimately on the Arab realization that Israel is ineradicable – in no small part thanks to their perception that the Jewish state has the ultimate weapon at its disposal.

Symposium addresses hearing impairment

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Correspondent

PETACH TIKVAH — A symposium on hearing impairment in infants and children brought together senior doctors and health care workers from Canada, Israel and Jordan.

The symposium, the fourth such international meeting on the subject of otology and audiology, took place recently at the Schneider Children's Medical Centre of Israel here. The last symposium on the subject was held in Jordan.

Canada, Israel, Jordan participate

The sponsors of the meeting were the Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), the Mount Sinai Hospital and the University of Toronto.

Prof. Arnold Noyek, chair of CISEPO, is a surgeon who also heads the ear, nose and throat department at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital.

"CISEPO has been in operation since 1984. It's a volunteer, charity funded, non-governmental organization based at Mount Sinai Hospital," Noyek said.

"Our main focus was in scientific exchange; in fact we trained about 20 physicians and scientists here in Israel, the object being that they would return to their country and take a leadership role in research, education and administration. It's been very effective.

"In 1995, the program became trilateral: Canada, Israel and one other country... All the time we tried to weave Israel into the matrix of the scientific program. I have been academically involved with Israel since the early '70s.

"We started to work with Israel because in those days Israel was being isolated in international medical exchanges and we wanted to overcome that barrier. Now we work with all of Israel's four medical schools and we also have special programs for Soviet olim.

"Three years ago King Hussein and the Israeli government invited us to take a role in peace-building and apply our academic, medical collaborative skills in the region."

Noyek explained that although other medical disciplines will be the subject of joint collaboration, hearing problems have been chosen at present because the incidence of hearing loss in children in the Middle East is very high, particularly with problems arising from genetic deafness.

"We want to establish a hearing-loss association in the Middle East, starting with Israel and Jordan and then extending to the Palestinians, Egyptians and Moroccans. In Canada, we have support from both the Jewish and Arab communities," he said.

Noyek appreciates the cooperation the program received from the Royal Jordanian Medical Services. "They have been wonderful partners," said Noyek. "They recognize that we were are trying to bring something tangible to the region. For example, we have brought from Mount Sinai Hospital the software for the Jordanians to help establish automated hearing tests for the elderly."

'I would like to see more cooperation'

Dr. Mohammed Al-Omari, head of the ear, nose and throat department of the King Hussein Medical Centre in Amman, said, "We have been working together since 1995 on this subject and I hope it will continue successfully. You can see the fruits because you can see we are now again here in Israel. I was also here a year ago and I would like to see more cooperation.

"We need to establish a research forum, so that instead of only curing the patient, we also practise preventative medicine. In both Israel and Jordan, we have almost the same medical problems. We will take from Israel their experiences and we will exchange our own experiences with the Israelis. With the cooperation of the Canadians, it will be a nice way to bring people together and to have successful scientific action. We want to see a deepening of relationships in the medical profession, and I am going to push hard for it."

Report scores Swiss bank

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — A long-awaited report examining Switzerland's hand in the Nazi gold trade is fueling Jewish demands for more Swiss compensation and accountability.

The report, commissioned by the Swiss government and issued by an independent panel of historians, concludes that during the war, Swiss National Bank officials knew they were buying looted gold from Nazi Germany, but turned a blind eye and went ahead with "business as usual."

That charge has been put forth – even documented – by the U.S. government and Jewish officials before, but this marks the first time a study sanctioned by Switzerland has reached that conclusion.

The report of the so-called Bergier Commission once again throws the spotlight on Switzerland's wartime role, even as the United States is preparing to issue its own report that some observers say is intended, in part, to underscore the fact that other countries were involved in wartime transactions with the Nazis.

The U.S. report, on gold transactions between Nazi Germany and other wartime neutrals, is a follow-up to a report last year that focused largely on Switzerland's World War II-era financial dealings.

Like last year's U.S. report, this week's Bergier Commission study criticized Switzerland for its extensive financial dealings with Nazi Germany.

The Bergier report specifically targeted the Swiss National Bank for following an "ethic of the least effort" to trace the origins of the looted gold during the war, even though bank officials "became increasingly aware that Jews and other persecuted groups were being robbed."

The study by historians from Switzerland, the United States, Israel, England and Poland also confirmed that Switzerland was the leading centre of German gold transactions and that the Swiss National Bank was the biggest client.

Overall, the report estimates, Switzerland's central bank bought $280 million (US) worth of gold from the Nazis, which would be valued at $2.5 billion today.

Switzerland has defended its wartime purchases of gold from the German Reichsbank as necessary for maintaining the country's economic stability.

Jewish officials immediately seized on the report's findings as they renewed calls for Switzerland to agree to be part of a global settlement of all Holocaust-era claims stemming from Swiss actions during World War II.

The World Jewish Congress, lawyers representing Holocaust victims, and Switzerland's three largest private banks have been holding settlement talks in recent weeks under the aegis of the U.S. State Department.

But the Swiss government has so far refused to join the commercial banks in the talks.

Thomas Borer, Switzerland's point man on Holocaust restitution issues, said this week as the Bergier report was released that his government "won't take part in any settlement that involves taxpayers' money."

The World Jewish Congress, for its part, called on Switzerland to provide compensation for all looted gold it took in during the war – not just the $58 million it turned over to the Allies in accordance with a 1946 accord reached in Washington.

Under the terms of that agreement, the Allies agreed to drop all claims for looted gold bought from Nazi Germany.

The Swiss government, however, said this week that there were no grounds for any reparation by the government or the Swiss National Bank.

Although the government criticized the central bank's wartime managers for lacking "the necessary sensitivity for moral and political considerations," it said the bank had already made a sufficient gesture by contributing $68 million last year to a humanitarian fund set up to benefit Holocaust victims.

The World Jewish Congress said Switzerland's refusal to provide additional restitution "desecrates the memory of the victims of the Nazis" and is a "moral stain on Switzerland."

"In effect, they have ignored the findings of their own commission," said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the WJC. "Why appoint a commission if you are not going to act on its findings?"

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, called the Swiss government's reaction "an exercise in damage control rather than full commitment to the truth."

He said Switzerland must follow up on the report by directly confronting the basic moral issues and come clean with all relevant historical facts if it wants to attain closure.

The Week in Israel

May 25

• U.S. House Speaker Newt Gingrich, in Israel with a congressional delegation, reaffirmed his support for moving the U.S. Embassy to Jerusalem from Tel Aviv.

May 26

• Palestinian legislators became embroiled in a melee with Israeli police over the construction of tin huts by Ateret Cohanim, an Orthodox nationalist group in the Muslim Quarter of the Old City. Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert promised the huts would be torn down.

May 27

• The Israeli Broadcasting Authority dismissed two of its journalists and reprimanded two others for apparently doctoring a report involving Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to make it seem as if Netanyahu encouraged chants of "Death to Arabs" when he appeared at a local soccer rally.

(The dismissals were subsequently set aside.)

May 28

• Two IDF soldiers, Yehuda Salem and Avraham Limoy, were killed by Hezbollah in south Lebanon.

May 29

50 Years Ago

TEL AVIV, May 19 — The 1,500 beleaguered Jews in the Old City of Jerusalem today received a supply of urgently needed food, water and medical supplies, when Jewish army units battling Arab Legionnaires broke through the Arab ring around the area and later joined forces with the several hundred haggard defenders within the Old City's confines.

Jewish units today captured Sarafand, formerly the biggest British base in Palestine. Several months ago, the Jews had offered to buy the camp from the British for $2.4 million, but the British turned the camp over to the Arab Legion. The camp, of tremendous military strategic importance, is located between Lydda airport and Tel Aviv and controls the main highway from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

Iran to give Hamas $15 million a month

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — An agreement between Iranian officials and Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin will provide the movement with some $15 million (US) a month and also calls for a Hezbollah-style organization to be set up to assist Hamas in carrying out terrorist activities, according to a report in the Paris-based Al-Wattan al-Arabi last week.

As Israeli security and government officials continued to debate whether Yassin will be permitted to return to Gaza, he collected donations of some $300 million from the Gulf states, causing Palestinian Authority (PA) officials to express their concern at his growing power, fearing it will weaken PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's position, Army Radio said last week.

"If Yassin is prevented from returning to Gaza, it will lead to violence and Israel will pay the price," Hamas spokesperson Mahmoud Zahar said last week. He denied that Yassin is collecting funds to carry out attacks on Israel and said he had been invited to undergo medical treatment in Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

"Where he received invitations to visit, he went," Zahar said.

Army Radio said Yassin reportedly asked for donations for Hamas during prayer sessions and meetings he conducted throughout the Gulf states. Throughout his visit, Yassin has continued to criticize the PA and condemn the peace process.

During his visit in Syria, Yassin stressed the pact he had signed with Iran and told reporters: "We refuse to recognize Israel and will continue to oppose all those that do."

Zahar said that it is a known fact that Hamas has offices in Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, and Iran.

According to Israel Television's English news, Jordan and Lebanon have said they will not allow Yassin to enter.

Yassin, who was released from prison last October in a trade for the Mossad agents captured in the abortive assassination attempt on Hamas leader in Jordan, Khaled Meshal, was allowed to leave Gaza to undergo medical treatment three months ago and has since visited over a dozen Arab countries.

Nazis' Czech victims receive compensation

By RANDI DRUZIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PRAGUE — Eduard Belas spent three years during World War II in labor and concentration camps in Slovakia.

Now with money from a joint Czech-German fund for victims of Nazism, Belas, 78, believes that "our suffering has been acknowledged to some degree."

The fund was established in January 1997 by the two governments.

After months of delays, which sparked a series of protests by the country's aging survivors, the fund's officials have begun issuing payments to 6,200 victims of Nazism, Jews and non-Jews. An additional 300 victims are expected to start receiving payments next month.

Approximately 2,000 of the recipients are Jewish.

The German-Czech declaration establishing the fund, which was in negotiation for almost two years, was intended to ease long-standing tensions rooted in Germany's wartime occupation of Czech lands and the subsequent deportation of Sudeten Germans from postwar Czechoslovakia.

Jewish leaders complained at the time of the pact's signing that Germany did not comment on the Holocaust in the declaration, which stated that Germany "regrets the suffering and iniquities inflicted on the Czech people."

The fund, which was originally to be used for communal projects, was created with some $76 million from Germany and about $12.9 million from the Czech government.

"The money will be a great help to these people because some of them have very modest pensions," said Oldrich Stransky, chair of the Association of Former Political Prisoners. "Now they can live the rest of their lives with some dignity."

Those imprisoned up to 12 months will receive some $900 each year, those imprisoned between 12 and 30 months will receive about $1,100, and those imprisoned longer than 30 months will receive about $1,400. All of the payments will be made annually.

Fund officials describe the annual payments as humanitarian aid, saying that the money is intended to help victims with health and social needs.

For his part, Belas said he would use some of the money to subsidize his wife's spinal operation. He said he also plans to use some of the money to purchase a new sofa – and will add the rest to his savings.

"I am glad we are receiving the money," he said.

Book explains Jewish spirituality

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

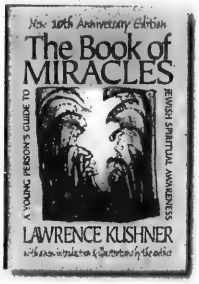
Part of being Jewish is having some kind of a relationship with God. But for most of us, that is not an easy thing.

It may surprise you to know that even grown-ups have a lot of questions. Just where do we find God? What is He like? Does He really listen to us when we pray?

And then there are the questions we sometimes think we shouldn't ask, like "Why do terrible things happen to very good people?"

The Book of Miracles: a young person's guide to Jewish spiritual awareness, by Rabbi Lawrence Kushner (Jewish Lights, 1997), is not a new book. In fact, the publisher has just produced the 10th anniversary edition.

The reason they did this is that the book is so good at explaining about the Jewish people and God, and individual people and God.



You might expect this kind of book to be very hard to read, but The Book of Miracles is not at all like that. Rabbi Kushner uses a lot of parables, which are funny, sad or moving stories that teach a lesson. He explains his points in simple language, but not the kind that makes children feel like they are stupid.

For instance, one chapter talks about taking responsibility for what you do. When Adam and Eve ate an apple (actually, it was probably a pomegranate), first they blame each other, then they blamed the snake. Rabbi Kushner knows us, he says, "We too sometimes blame our brothers and sisters, our parents, our enemies, and our friends. We even try to blame God."

God answers that "It is your world. You are free to do with it as you choose...If I [told you what to do], then you would be nothing more than a puppet. Instead, I will tell you what is right and wrong. You are then free to choose for yourself how to act...Just remember that I will hold you responsible for what you do."

One of the best things about The Book of Miracles is that it is the kind of book that children and adults will enjoy reading to each other, and taking the time to talk about what is in it.

Photographer explores his anger

BY ADAM BELLO

Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In a series dedicated to the Holocaust, photographer Martin Kellerstein has set his sights on expanding the art of the medium, using a novel process where images are painted onto film during development.

He creates a print by manipulating and injecting color into the emulsions of unexposed Polaroid/instant film, and he says that the approach has given him the artistic outlet and emotional release he needed for the subject.

"Creating these pictures gave me a way to explore my personal anger," Kellerstein says. "For years, I wanted to do something that would allow me to explore all these feelings I've had about the Holocaust and the life of the generation that survived after the war.

Creating a series of physical reflections in everyday objects, Martin Kellerstein seeks emotional reactions from viewers in the show Reflections, at Gallery Gabor in Mirvish Village until June 4.

"In this technique, you start with a photograph but end up with a kind of lithograph, which allowed me to capture my emotional state."

With a working title of Chai – Life, Kellerstein says the series of 18 prints explores a tapestry of emotions from terror to hopelessness, and ultimately defiance.

He is currently negotiating a showing of the series in Toronto.

A dentist with a full-time practice in the Riverdale area of Toronto, Kellerstein has also been a photographer for nearly three decades, but he has only come into the eye of the arts community in recent years.

A photograph given by Kellerstein to a friend as a gift was shown to the owner of the Gallery Gabor in Mirvish Village in Toronto. The owner contacted Kellerstein to view more of his portfolio, and the result was a showing of his work in 1996, which was viewed by hundreds.

Last month, Kellerstein returned to Gallery Gabor with the launch of Reflections, an exhibition of black and white photographs. Running until June 4, the show has been well received by the arts community and other gallery owners, he says.

"The title of my exhibition is meant to have a double meaning; it refers to the visual images, many of which were taken in reflection through glass or a mirror, and to the mental and emotional reflections that the images inspire in the viewer."

While his inclination for new approaches to the art of photography may be a result of his being mostly self-taught, Kellerstein has also studied with several acclaimed photographers including Ansel Adams, Fred Picker, and Susan Barron.

"My interests in photography are in the same vein as theirs in that I like to capture the 'quietness' of an image at a given time and place."

Animated Moses film coming this December

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Prince of Egypt, a full-length animated feature on the life of Moses, won't premiere until Dec. 18, but the publicity buildup is already in full swing.

What is known already is that among the prodigious feats of computer-generated animation will be seven million locusts, 16,000 Israelites fleeing Egypt and a spectacular four-minute parting of the Red Sea.

Taking no chances, the producers have consulted some 500 religious leaders of all faiths – and the staff includes a full-time liaison to the Jewish community.

The voice of Moses will be actor Val Kilmer, and other voice parts will go to Michelle Pfeiffer and Ralph Fiennes. When God speaks, it will likely be a combination of voice, sound effects and music.

DreamWorks faces some tough marketing problems with its $50-million to $60-million project. The studio must convince moviegoers that Prince of Egypt is not a cartoon for kids, but a serious feature for sophisticated adults.

CONCERT IN AID OF VIENNA CEMETERY

Walter Pagler is a Viennese Catholic who for many years has helped to restore the sprawling old Jewish cemetery of Vienna, which contains more than 60,000 graves and which had been in derelict condition since 1945.

Thanks to Pagler's association, Verein Schalom, much-needed renovations have been started at Vienna's Central Cemetery and 43 other Austrian Jewish cemeteries. However, much work remains to be done.

The Toronto Friends of Walter Pagler are hosting Vienna In Music and Words, an evening of entertainment in aid of the Verein Schalom. Heliconian Club, 35 Hazelton Ave. (off Yorkville), Toronto. $50 per person includes light refreshments (kosher). June 21, 6 p.m. Send cheque to Friends of Walter Pagler, 4383 Bathurst St., Apt. 902, Downsview Ont., M3H 3P8. Donations invited. 922-8002.

Jewish Music: Heart and Soul: An Evening of Jewish Music and Song features renowned singer and recording artist Avraham Fried, who has captivated congregations around the world with his unique blend of traditional cantorial liturgical music and contemporary Chassidic melodies. Sharing the bill are Montreal-born cantor Ari Klein, Toronto's own Nafshenu Orchestra and the Toronto Jewish Male Choir.

Ford Center, North York. June 24, 7:30 p.m. Sponsored by Chabad Lubavitch of Markham. Tickets available at select Jewish bookstores or by phoning 905-709-2372.

Interested parties are invited to attend a meeting in the Winchevsky's library, 585 Cranbrooke Ave., June 3, 7:30 p.m.

Casting Call (2): The producers of The Wizard of Oz, which opens this month at Toronto's Hummingbird Centre, were feverishly seeking Munchkins last week. Although hopefuls were advised "to follow the yellow brick road" down to the Hummingbird Centre on June 2, it's possible the producers didn't fill their quota.

According to the press release, candidates "must be less than 4'10" tall (height will be checked upon arrival) and seven years old and up. They will be judged on their animation, energy and ability to dance and sing the chorus to Ding Dong The Witch Is Dead. Unique qualities such as a 'Munchkin-like voice' will also be considered. 393-7445.

Israeli Film: The Toronto Jewish Film Society and The Friends of Yiddish are jointly sponsoring a screening of the Israeli film Too Early To Be Quiet, Too Late to Sing (1996). The film shows director Chava Albertstein visiting Israel's top Yiddish poets and writers. "The elderly artists charm as they recite their works, discuss their lives and make an eloquent argument for the continuing endurance of Yiddishkeit.

Discussion with Toronto Yiddish poet Simcha Simchovitch to follow. June 7, 5 p.m. Art Gallery of Ontario, Jackman Hall, 317 Dundas St. W. (McCaul St. entrance). Members free; guests $7.50. (The 7:30 p.m. showing is sold out.)

History and the Jewish sensibility

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With his second successive book having reached the New York Times bestseller list, author Thomas Cahill says he expects that the newer book, The Gifts of the Jews: How a Tribe of Desert Nomads Changed the Way Everyone Thinks and Feels, will be the most important work in an envisioned seven-volume series. The Hinges of History, through which he intends to recount pivotal moments in the evolution of human sensibility.

The first book, How the Irish Saved Civilization, sold more than a million copies and was on the New York Times list for 18 months. "I was just getting my feet wet with that book," Cahill admits. "It was a way of gathering an audience whose attention I now have. The book about the Irish was a kind of finger exercise, a means of getting myself started."

In The Gifts of the Jews, Cahill traces the stories of Abraham, Lot, Moses, David, Amos, Isaiah, Naomi, Ruth and other biblical personalities. As he examines, interprets and comments upon key passages from the Torah, he reveals a significant knowledge of the ancient world, intermittently finding relevant comparisons and insights in the words of modern writers like Bob Dylan.

The book begins in ancient Sumer with a discussion of the pagan antecedents of Abraham. The pagans, Cahill explains, had a cyclical view of history – for them the present was merely a repetition of the past – and were without a sense of destiny. "Then Abraham arrives on the scene with a different kind of world view" and a linear view of history, he continues.

"With Abraham, time became real for the first time. Abraham is taught to expect something new, something that has never been before. Rather than recurrence, he's taught to expect surprise."

Abraham, according to Cahill, never was a strict monotheist, even though the God that speaks to him becomes larger and larger as the story progresses. "We see here monotheism in its tadpole stage… With Moses you get a stricter monotheism, with the revelation at Mount Sinai. There's a 'monotheistic personalism' that continues to evolve throughout the Bible."

Pagan antecedents of Abraham

In preparation for writing The Gifts of the Jews, the articulate 57-year-old New Yorker (who is not Jewish) became a visiting scholar for two years at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, where he learned to read the Torah in its original Hebrew. "I wanted to be able to read the Bible with Jews," he explains. "I found that a fascinating experience because Jews do not read the Bible the way Christians do.

"For Jews, the Bible is the story of their family, and they have a much more immediate relationship with the story. For Christians, when they sit down in a Bible session — I swear, they sit and wait for someone to tell them authoritatively what it means, and then they move on to the next passage. That's a bit of a caricature, perhaps, but it's not too far from the truth.

"Jews, on the other hand, approach the Bible, not with less reverence, but more informally, and they don't expect in any one sitting or session to come to the ultimate truth of a passage. Because of that, there's much more give and take, and there's much more elbow room for everyone."

Cahill says he is trying to make history accessible to modern readers. His envisioned series is not like Will and Ariel Durant's encyclopedic retelling of history which was "much more intellectual than what I'm doing. I think of myself as doing a history of the development of a sensibility, which is a word that combines both thinking and feeling. It's not just cerebral. I'm telling the story of the evolution of Western sensibility, and I'd like to tell it as simply as possible.

"There's no point in writing 500-page books since no one has time for them any more. Small books are better. Most of what people have to say can be said in 300 pages or less."

The Gifts of the Jews, which is 291 pages long, is published by Doubleday with a cover price of $32.95.

TORONTO — Carved in Stone is an exhibition of photographs taken by artist Michaele Jordana when she travelled to the Middle East for the first time last summer.

The exhibit documents a people – a "First Nation" – who have survived to celebrate several millennia. The photographs depict the ancient culture of the Israelites, ancestors of the modern Jewish people, whose beliefs remain "carved in stone," the same today as they were millennia ago.

"I felt completely humbled in a land so sacred to so many people," Jordana said of her trip to the Middle East. "In Israel the air is heavy with a sense of Divine Presence, as if there is a molecular hookup at this particular point on earth with eternity.

"My whole being was jarred by ancient memories that seemed to affect virtually everyone. And yet these images exist alongside and within a contemporary and vital society."

The exhibit is running until June 15 at the Beach Hebrew Institute, 109 Kenilworth Ave. Toronto. Call 694-7942 for information.

STRUB'S Pickle Corner STRUB'S

Vol. 1, No. 3 • June 4, 1998

Hello! How are ya? A special welcome to our new readers in Buffalo, Rochester and Western New York State. Thanks to all of you who took the time to write me. I am looking for your funniest pickle moment, and your happiest pickle memory to print in upcoming editions of "Pickle Corner". Keep the e-mail, letters and pictures coming!

Question of the Month

Dear Pickle Guy:

Seeing your "Pickle Corner" in the Buffalo Jewish Review brought back nice memories of my growing up in Hamilton. The biggest treat was going over to Strub's and sampling pickles right out of the barrel. Whenever my family came to visit me in Buffalo, they brought my favourite "Strub's" pickles. I'm glad that I can now find "Strub's" with the same homemade flavour, right here in Buffalo. Thanks!

— Sincerely, E.G.R., Williamsville, New York

The Pickle Guy Replies

Dear E.G.R.:

You'll be glad to know that after 70 years of pickle making, we still barrel cure and cold pack our full sour pickles in their original brine, according to my great-grandmother's recipe. Have you tried our other family recipes for Homestyle pickles? Our Bread & Butter and our Baby Dill pickles are also "just like Bubie used to make". All your favourite "Strub's" pickles are now available at your local supermarket, in the refrigerated section. If you don't see them, ask your store manager for "Strub's" pickles, by name. Thank you for your wonderful letter. I'm pleased that you and your family will continue to have many Simchas with "Strub's" pickles.

Remember, send your letters, pictures, and postcards to me:

Pickle Guy
c/o Strub's Pickle Corner
100 Roy Boulevard
BRANTFORD, ON N3R 7K2
e-mail: STRUBPICKL@AOL.COM

I answer ALL my mail, and if I use your letter in "Pickle Corner", I'll send you one of my "Pickle Guy" T-shirts and Hats. Thanks, and talk to you next month in the July 2 issue of the CJN, BJR and JL.

Got a question? Write to me, the Pickle Guy — I answer ALL my mail!

Business Profile

BY ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

MARKHAM — As a result of their volunteer work, Ira Sack and Danny Iannuzziello share a unique perspective of the Jewish community.

Iannuzziello, an apartment building realtor who formed Skyview Realty in 1989, and his sales associate Ira Sack have taken up the cause of Reena, an organization dedicated to helping people with developmental disabilities and integrating them into the community as much as possible.

As chair of Batay Reena (literally the homes of Reena), the organization's non-profit housing board, Iannuzziello's job is to match housing to the needs of Reena clients.

The two men have drawn on the chemistry they discovered between them in volunteering as the foundation for their business success since Sack became a sales associate with Skyview in January 1997.

"A healthy business starts with having the right team dynamic, and I have been fortunate to share that on two levels with Ira," says Iannuzziello.

"If you work with people who complement your skills, your business will work as a whole greater than the sum of its parts."

One of the few real estate brokers in Toronto specializing in selling apartment complexes, the Markham-based businessman of Italian descent has not only built a cross-cultural bridge through his experiences with Reena, but volunteering has also provided him with professional insights that have shaped the course of his business.

"I didn't know it at the time, but there was this parallel between building up Skyview and the undertakings in Reena that I felt very strongly about," he says.

"Over time, the projects I had worked on in Batay Reena became experience-builders that I took into my own work."

The sentiments are echoed by Sack, chair of the Reena Foundation's fundraising board. When they met through Reena, Sack says, the rapport they shared in volunteering readily carried over into Skyview.

"It was a natural coming together, in that Danny and I complement each other and admire qualities the other possesses," Sack says.

"In Reena and Skyview, we have seen how the other excels and sparkles. His style is more serious because he approaches the situation from a management and strategy perspective. Mine lies in the people skills, and keeping situations from getting too intense.

"We take on different roles and even try to be a little like the other, but we go into it each day knowing that our primary goal is satisfying the client, not our individual egos. That is the only important thing."

Iannuzziello's start in apartment building realty came in the early 1980s. After receiving his real estate licence, he learned the business of building management by running a triplex his father had entrusted to him and his sister Angela. Having thus learned about the business, he entered the realty profession full time. Working as a real estate agent, Iannuzziello gained skills in assembling groups of investors together while assessing building management needs.

He formed Skyview in 1989, entering the building marketplace during a slump. But by using Skyview's early days as a learning experience, Iannuzziello was able to be persistent about finding opportunities.

He developed the business based on a track record of effective marketing strategies and quick turnarounds in the sale of buildings across Toronto. Skyview has had "non stop success" since 1993, he says.

"The key in apartment brokerage is knowing the needs and wants of the buyers," Iannuzziello says. "Jewish investors have a strong presence in this marketplace, and working with an organization tied as closely to this community as Reena not only lets me do something worthwhile within it, but gives me professional and cultural insights that became assets in doing business."

Iannuzziello has not only seen his business evolve, he has also gained some admirers within the real estate industry and the Jewish community.

George Friedmann, an apartment building manager and current developer of the Windsor Arms Hotel in Toronto, spoke of his previous dealings with Iannuzziello and Sack. "I could see [during the sale of apartments under my management,] how they put attention on ethics and providing planning options, and you need to work from those fundamentals to be in this area of realty in the long run," he says.

"Danny and Ira are more than salesmen, because they understand how to bridge the gap between the buyer's needs and the seller's wants."

While the relationship with Reena has been fruitful for Skyview, Iannuzziello's work with Reena came out of a personal situation. His involvement with the organization and the Toronto Jewish community began 14 years ago when he and Angela sought programming for their brother Franco. They were unable to find suitable help in the Italian community, but they discovered what they were looking for through Reena.

Franco, 32, now lives in a Reena apartment unit and participates in a workshop to develop job placement skills.

Today, all three Reena chairs work out of the same building. Angela Iannuzziello, who is chair of the Reena board, shares professional office space with Skyview as an engineer in transportation planning.

"Reena has been very supportive of our family, giving us the opportunity to participate in creating individualized programming for Franco and others facing similar situations," she says.

Iannuzziello says he and Sack are purchasing a home at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue to be used as a Reena seniors' residence. It is expected to be in operation by 1999. The average age of Reena clients is projected to be 55 by 2005.

Iannuzziello says they are currently developing a similar model for families of clients-in-waiting to purchase apartment units.

Reflecting on their relationship, Sack says the interaction of Jewish and Italian culture in the daily operation of Skyview has created a healthy exchange of ideas ... and possibly life choices.

"By the time we are ready to retire, I will probably live at Villa Columbo and Danny will stay at Baycrest Terrace."

Soccer squad a cosmopolitan collection of players

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — David Hapier may be typical of the kind of player who represents Kadimah in the Hispano-America Soccer League.

Born in Kiev in the former Soviet Union, Hapier and his family emigrated to Italy when he was a youngster. In Italy, he started kicking the ball around and after the family moved to Toronto when he was nine, he played for a number of local teams including Toronto Italia, Azzuri and North York Cosmos.

A member of the Canadian national program at 16, at 18 he laced up his cleats for the North York Rockets in the Canadian Soccer League.

For a few years he lived in one of the world's soccer hotbeds, Buenos Aires, where he played for the Rangers in the country's second division. He represented Canada at the Maccabi Youth Games in 1987, winning a bronze medal and he was on the national team at the 1989 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

All in all, a pretty cosmopolitan CV for a guy who's only 28 years old. But compared to his teammates, it's not all that unusual as most of the members of Kadimah hail from somewhere other than "The Manor."

Drawn from players from Israel, the former Soviet Union and even a few Canadians, Kadimah recently opened its inaugural season in the Hispano-America Soccer League with a 2-1 loss to Cocha Bamba, a team consisting of Chilean expatriates.

Henry Charles Cowen, the team's feisty general manager, said Kadimah could have won that game but for a couple of near-misses at the opposition's goal post. He said the team's play was satisfactory — but it will have to be at least that considering the high calibre of the opposition they'll face this year.

The league, made up of teams representing Latin American countries like Chile, Argentina and Uruguay, is considered an international "B Division," the equivalent of a European country's "B Division." Short of a professional league, it's the best soccer that's played in Toronto, he said.

Although he was born in Israel, Tamir Bar-On learned the game with teams from Armourdale (now called the North York Hearts). At 12 or 13, he was on the community's premier team and in his late teens, he played midfield for McGill's Varsity team.

The Hispano-America league "is a very good league...the top level amateur soccer." A veteran of the 1987 Youth Games bronze medal team, Bar-On said Kadimah's strength is hard work and discipline. As for the team's cosmopolitan makeup, he quoted an old Hungarian saying: "You need guys who can carry the piano and you need guys who can play the piano."

Boris Ladizhinsky, 22, is the team's captain and secretary. Born in Kishinev, Moldova, he plays sweeper and left fullback. Last season, he played with about six of his current Kadimah teammates for Toronto Maccabi in the Hispano-America League, but they decided to form their own squad this season.

"I think we're (Kadimah) better. We have a lot better chemistry this year. We're a lot better disciplined and we have more talent," he said. Last year, Toronto Maccabi finished ninth out of 12 teams.

Ayal Cohen, 29, is a veteran of the Israeli second division where he played for Hapoel Ashkelon as halfback/striker. Used to playing before sizable crowds, Cohen said the biggest difference between soccer in Canada and in Israel is that in Israel it's "a religion, here it's a pastime."

Roma Ijack, 23, was born in Kishinev, grew up in Israel but moved to Toronto during his high school years. He played for Newtonbrook and like Ladizhinsky went to the OFSAA championships.

David Kotkowsky, 25, was born in Jerusalem and at 17 played for Jerusalem United in the country's second division. He moved to Canada two years ago.

Fred Cowen, 25, plays left midfield for Kadimah and was an alternate for Toronto Maccabi last year. Cowen played high school soccer for South Nepean in Ottawa's first division but "this league is more competitive," he said.

"It's very technical. They play very aggressively. They go in hard so you have to play with all your heart."

Playing with guts and determination is his father, Henry's, credo when it comes to soccer. It's the way he played when he was on Hakoach Toronto, a team supported by the Hungarian community in the 1960s. Back then, the team played in the city's "ethnic league," Cowen said, and "we experienced lots of anti-Semitism."

There was so much tension at the games that police cruisers were dispatched to the games and they were parked next to the field to serve as a deterrent and to be on hand to break up any fights.

"A lot of dirty words were exchanged back then. Now, it's improved. You don't hear a dirty word now and there's no roughness. Now things usually go smoothly."

Cowen, who's vice-president of the Canadian Transplant Association, Ontario region and an ardent proponent of carrying organ donation cards, said Kadimah is open to sponsors wishing to assist the team.

For more information, Cowen can be reached at 905-669-4277.

Kadimah's full roster includes: Ladizhinsky, Ijack, Cowen, Bar-On, Cohen, Kotkowsky, Hafier, Yaron Napastek, Iouri Gordon, Ran Leshen, Misgav Shram, Stan Afriat, Igor Zaslawsky, Luis Aguiar, Nadav Keinigstein, Yariv Sharon, Amir Cohen, Boris Caledonio and Ziv Fishman. The team is coached by David Rumack.

Spirituality in the Workplace

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Among the positive aspects of having the United States as a neighbor is the luxury of having the latest social trend or fad tested before it lands here. We have a cushion of months, sometimes years, before the newest straw in the wind is proven, or not, in the United States.

Canadians should gird for the latest development, because, with a little luck and a change in attitudes, it will take hold here.

It revolves around a buzz word – spirituality – not the New Age wind-chimes and whale-sounds wafting out of California or New Mexico – but a whole new way in which we regard work and the workplace.

Those of us who work in the Jewish community encounter spirituality, or closeness with God, or some identification with Judaism, almost every day. But for the rest of the labor force, work can be a dreary, barren place where our hopes are dashed and our souls are starved.

Spirituality in the workplace is roaring across the United States like a tidal wave, spawning a cottage industry of books, tapes, retreats and consultants, and it's certain to crash here in some form or another. There's a hunger for workplace spirituality, Americans have been told, for a host of reasons: the approaching end of the millennium, baby boomers who have discovered religion because they're now realizing they are mortal; people working longer hours, despite predictions the opposite would happen; and an inward reaction to a corporate world that reaps billions while "downsizing" (read ruining the lives of) loyal employees.

A portent for Canada was gauged last week with the attendance of more than 200 senior managers, human resource experts and assorted labor mavens at a three-day conference in Toronto on Spirituality in the Workplace. There, they heard some 75 diverse and multi-faith speakers, including several rabbis, expound on how to take a grassroots groundswell into the heart of corporate Canada.

It was the first major conference in Canada to explore this emerging trend. Notable too, was that it was sponsored by an improbable alliance of blue-chip companies and various faith groups.

This had all the makings of a touchy-feely exercise, but it wasn't. Clearly, something's afoot. The workplace used to represent life-long security, a sense of purpose, and a decent wage. Now, it is bound up with outsourcing, "rightsizing," anxiety, overwork and underachievement.

For Martin Rutte, one of the conference's keynote speakers, all these issues are issues of the spirit. Rutte is the co-author of Chicken Soup for the Soul at Work, which has sold over 600,000 copies in North America. A Hamilton native, his own spirituality is rooted in that city's Orthodox Beth Jacob Synagogue. Now based in Santa Fe, N.M., Rutte, after much initial resistance, has been exploring workplace spirituality for 15 years, and has been a consultant to several high-profile companies.

He noticed serious morale problems in the corporate world due to weakened and dispirited work forces. Today, there's a "festering cynicism," he said, due, in part, to the fact that 60 percent of the thousands of new jobs created in the United States pay less than $10 an hour.

But spurred by socially conscious companies like The Body Shop, Ben & Jerry's and even the World Bank, which recently grew a conscience, more and more workplaces are going spiritual: creating environments where talk of God is not frowned on; advocating worship or meditation; conducting business ethically; and imbuing work practices with spiritual components.

More tangibly, some companies are allowing their employees to volunteer at homeless shelters or for religious causes – on company time.

Rutte says it's paid off in the United States with skyrocketing creativity, the unleashing of employees' potential and more evidence of moral and ethical behavior. Workers are taking fewer sick days and managers are less stressed.

As Rutte put it, the past 20 years of business have been driven by information technology. The next 20, he predicts, will be driven by the application of consciousness.

STRAWBERRY COFFEECAKE

Cake:
1 cup all purpose flour
2 tblsp. butter or margarine, melted
1 1/2 cups sliced strawberries
2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 cup milk
1 egg

Topping:
1/2 cup all purpose flour
1/2 cup sugar
1/4 cup butter or margarine, softened
1/4 cup chopped walnuts or pecans

Preheat oven to 375°F. Grease an 8" square pan; set aside. In large mixer bowl, combine all cake ingredients except strawberries. With electric mixer on medium, beat 2 mins. until well blended. Pour batter into prepared pan, and arrange strawberries evenly over batter.

To prepare topping, in medium bowl, combine flour and sugar. With pastry blender or two knives in scissor fashion, cut in butter until mixture resembles coarse crumbs. Stir in nuts. Sprinkle topping evenly over strawberries. Bake 35-40 mins. or until golden brown. Cool on wire rack 15 mins. Serve warm, or cool completely.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I don't know where to turn. My mother is presently in the hospital recovering from hip surgery. She fell in the bathroom while taking a shower. Now, she can no longer walk by herself and is extremely fearful of falling again. Although she is elderly and somewhat frail, before this happened she lived alone and was very independent. I'm afraid that they will be sending her home soon even though she cannot take care of herself. I work fulltime and have no siblings with whom to share this overwhelming responsibility. When I suggested to my mother she stay with me for a while she stubbornly refuses. What can I do?

Worried Daughter

Dear Worried,

I suggest you speak with the hospital social worker who has assessed your mother, in order to clarify her limitations as well as her capabilities. The social worker will devise a discharge plan accordingly, making any necessary referrals. This might include a doctor's recommendation for rehabilitation and physiotherapy. Other community services such as Meals on Wheels and homecare services can be set up to assist your mother at home for as long as necessary. Additionally, it would be advisable to have her bathroom assessed by an occupational therapist in order to ensure the necessary bathroom aids are in place. These can include a proper non-skid mat, grab-bars, bathchair and adjustable telephone shower. These aids will reduce the risk for falls in the future.

As for yourself, being the sole caregiver can be exhausting, stressful and overwhelming at times. You might want to seek out a caregiver support group where you can find mutual support, information and suggestions as to how to care for an elderly relative while still looking after your own needs. These groups are often offered by local community groups and social service agencies.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

BRING THE BOYS BACK HOME

Mothers of Israeli soldiers in south Lebanon demonstrate outside the Israeli Defence Ministry in Tel Aviv last week. They were demanding that Israel bring its troops home. The protest coincided with the 16th anniversary of Israel's 1982 incursion into Lebanon. The women held paper doves aloft and wore T-shirts with the slogan "Stop the war" in Hebrew. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Rabin's lingering wounds

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leah Rabin smiles often – a wide, sincere smile. But there's a darkness in her eyes, almost a void.

When speaking of her slain husband, she gazes out a hotel window, as if directly addressing him. But there are no more tears. The anguish she feels, the wounds ripped open by her husband's assassination on Nov. 4, 1995, mirror those of a nation still trying to make sense of that convulsive moment.

Like many Israelis, Leah Rabin is blunt, not the least bit shy about wading right into the swirling wake left by her husband's murder. And murder she calls it, straight up.

"He didn't die," she says flatly. "You cannot refer to any kind of fate or God's will. He was just murdered."

And she doesn't like speaking of society's lingering wounds. "If there are wounds, they are mine, my family's, my friends' and maybe a rather large circle. But to wider circles who wish to see peace, it's not wounds. It's more in terms of the void [Yitzhak Rabin] left as a leader."

She returns to the theme several times, barely able to conceal her disdain for the present government and leadership of Benjamin Netanyahu. (There's little love lost between her and the prime minister. At her husband's funeral, she shook Netanyahu's hand, but quickly turned away, making her views about him well known.)

Exclusive

Treading carefully, she confesses to being "disenchanted" with the Likud coalition, and "wishing for a totally different kind of leadership. Hopefully, it is going to happen when there will be new elections."

In an hour-long interview with The CJN prior to her appearance at a gala dinner here for the Canada-Israel Children's Centres (see page 7), a still stoic Rabin, a grandmother of four, sounded alternately bitter and hopeful.

She "regrettably" concedes that she had "a very hard time" celebrating Israel's 50th birthday, partly because her husband did not live to see the day, but also because the current power structure, she charges, is deliberately playing down, even ignoring, the late leader's place in history.

At the big 50th jubilee bash in Jerusalem, "his name was hardly mentioned. There were pictures portraying [Israel's] history. The picture of the handshake with Yasser Arafat on the White House lawn was definitely missing. In other words, they do anything to conceal his role in history and the place he has in people's hearts and minds."

But "not for a minute" does she blame the far right or the Orthodox camps for the inflamed and often ugly anti-Rabin rhetoric in the months leading up the murder. The heated atmosphere "was conducted by the central leadership of the Likud to discredit the one leader that could have pulled through the peace process…the one man who enjoyed the faith of the great majority of the people of Israel."

The loss of her husband has manifested itself in a variety of ways, Rabin feels.

Consulate gets reprieve

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israel last week "suspended" plans to close its consulates in Montreal and at several other overseas sites, including Philadelphia, Atlanta and Marseille.

But despite renewed local hopes, Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Aviv Shiron, speaking to The CJN, made it clear that the closures, first disclosed publicly in the May 27 issue of the Israeli daily Ma'ariv, could still occur at some unspecified time in the "near future."

That's because, he said, the ministry remains under pressure from Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman to implement stiff budget cuts.

Local community leaders last week expressed a degree of relief at the reprieve and continued optimism that the consulate will not close.

But they vowed to keep on pressing Israel to keep it open – for now and forever.

"I would like to have this decision made with a degree of finality," Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region (CIC-Q) chair Thomas Hecht said last week, after hearing news of the reprieve.

"Progress has been made, but we will have to try to influence Israel's political decision-makers that closing this consulate, in particular, is contrary to Israel's interests."

Similarly, FEDERATION CJA president Stanley Plotnick last week stated that the community planned to "solidify" its position in the coming weeks.

Already, he said, the community has sent an "enormous amount of documentation" to Israel to support the case for keeping the consulate open permanently, and "we are fairly well-assured that the documentation will be reviewed."

Messianic Times returns

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto's Jewish community should brace itself for a new offensive by Christian proselytizers: A slick and professionally produced newspaper exhorting Jews to accept Jesus as their messiah is about to return.

Over 6,000 copies of the summer edition of The Messianic Times will be distributed free to Jewish areas in Toronto and York Region next month, says the paper's founder and managing editor, Zev Isaacs.

The papers will be delivered by hand to homes in Willowdale, Downsview and Thornhill because "we believe it is our responsibility to let Jewish people know that Yeshua [Jesus] is their messiah," Isaacs told The CJN in a telephone interview from the publication's head office in Bryn Mawr, PA.

The summer edition, he said, will be distributed in Miami, Los Angeles, New Jersey and Toronto.

The quarterly bills itself as the world's only international messianic Jewish newspaper. Isaacs founded it in Toronto in 1990, and it was immediately denounced as a tool to convert Jews, especially new Russian immigrants, to Christianity. Isaacs moved the operation to the United States in 1995.

He says the paper's circulation is 50,000 worldwide.

There are stories about Israel and Jewish issues. But it enjoins belief in "Yeshua" (Jesus), and proudly describes what it says are successful efforts around the world, including Canada, at converting Jews to so-called messianic Judaism, which accepts Christ as the Jewish messiah.

Over 1,000 issues of the paper's spring edition were distributed recently in Toronto, mainly in and around Bathurst Manor, which has a high Jewish population.

The full-color, full-page ad contains one of the names for God in large English letters, as well as the same word in Hebrew in a border around the page. Callers said that according to Jewish law, they can never throw the paper out because God's name appears in it in print.

Told of the controversy, Isaacs at first sounded apologetic.

He said he does "not go over every ad," but added that had he known this ad would offend some Jews, he would have "reconsidered" running it.

But he called The CJN a few days later, and sounded a different tone.

"If people feel compelled to keep it, that's wonderful. I have absolutely no regrets. If we had to do it again, we would.

"The name of the Lord should be known and praised."

Rabbi Michael Skobac, education director for Jews for Judaism, the counter-missionary organization, said the newspaper can be thrown away because "there is nothing holy about it."

Rabbi Skobac said it's "good to know" that 6,000 future editions are coming to Toronto. "We can build antibodies and strengthen our immune systems. Ultimately, a strong Jewish community has nothing to fear from 6,000 copies of The Messianic Times."

Some plenary highlights

Last week in this space, I recorded some observations of the 25th triennial plenary of the Canadian Jewish Congress that was held in Winnipeg on May 24 through 26.

I noted that the format of the program departed radically from previous plenaries. The chief point of departure was the decision to adopt a talk-show format for what in former conventions would have been the main working sessions. The conference room was converted into a television studio in which six one-hour panel discussions were videotaped.

I described it as the "Oprah Winfreyization" of the plenary, a celebration of soundbite over analysis and of form over substance.

Judging by the reactions of most of the delegates who enjoyed the opportunity to "participate" in the sessions, the decision was a popular one.

In this column, I will record what I considered to be the highlights of three of those sessions.

* * *

The first videotaping dealt with Jewish Continuity. The panel members were: Norman Spector, the former publisher of the Jerusalem Post; Israel Singer, the secretary general of the World Jewish Congress; Rabbi Alan Green of Winnipeg; and Dr. Norma Baumel Joseph of Montreal.

The most engaging, most impassioned comments were spoken, by far, from Joseph.

She urged the audience to be optimistic about the Jewish future and insisted that the only way such optimism about the future could be legitimate is by each person individually exploring and embracing, now, in the present, the limitless enrichments and rewards of being Jewish.

"Do Judaism," she emphasized in the colloquialism of the younger generation, "because [you] care about being a Jew, and not only for the sake of the grandchildren.

"Judaism must be enjoyed in the now to be experienced in its own right. And in this way, we work to a future that is present and we are Jewish not simply for the arrival [namely towards a destination that tries to ensure that our grandchildren will be Jewish – my interpretation] but for the journey too [for all there is to be experienced, understood, learned and lived]."

To underline the fact that she was not advocating any specific stream of Judaism, she confidently told the audience that there are many roads to being Jewish.

This point by Joseph responded to the main assertion by Spector, that "we need a much more secular definition of Judaism. It should be more inclusive," he said, obviously predicating his view on a narrow concept of religious Judaism. He returned to this theme in the following day's session on Jewish identity.

* * *

The second session dealt with the Prosecution of War Criminals. The panel members were Spector, Singer, Irving Abella, Edith Kimelman, a survivor, an educator, linguist and specialist in Judaic studies, and Neal Sher, recently appointed by the federal government as a special consultant to the War Crimes Unit.

The question was immediately asked of the panelists: "Why did it take so long?" For the entire session, it hung in the room like a gray cloud, threatening storm.

None of the speakers could answer the question directly. Abella tried to provide a historical context for the efforts of the community over the past 50 years. But it fell to Sher to sum up. He spoke emphatically. "There is still time to do something," he said. "People in Ottawa are interested in doing a good job, but the [war crimes] unit has a history of being on the defensive."

"Don't forget the frustrations; but there can never be, nor will there ever be, perfect justice."

* * *

The session entitled Issues Dividing and Uniting Israel and the Diaspora was the least satisfying to this observer. The panelists were Spector, Singer, Yoram East, a journalist living in Winnipeg, and Rhonda Spivak, a Winnipeg lawyer.

The key message from the panel, primarily articulated by Spector, was that "North American Jews have a responsibility to import the lessons of democracy to Israel." He later defined those key lessons as being, inter alia, "constitutionalism, free speech, and pluralism." His sentiments were echoed by Spivak.

Except for Singer, it was a display of high conceit and condescension by the members of the panel, who effortlessly prescribed their own long distance treatments for the ailments they expertly diagnosed as endemic to Israel's body politic.

Later in the day, at the celebrations at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, Israel's Ambassador to Canada, David Sultan felt compelled to answer the panel. "Lest anyone lament the fact that we [in Israel] do not conduct ourselves like North Americans, let me remind you that we do not live in North America." Sultan expressed the hope that "Israel's democracy [would] be a source of pride not of disdain or disrespect."

One need not be blind to the severe social problems besetting Israel. But having regard to Israel's neighborhood, to its need to live in constant readiness for war, and to its relatively young stage of development, Sultan's hope should be requited.

CJC urges govt. to aid vets interned at Buchenwald

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is calling on the federal government to push the cause of Canadian servicemen who were interned in Buchenwald during World War II.

Canada should use its influence with the German government to ensure that Canadian veterans receive pensions as compensation "for their improper incarceration in the horror that was the Buchenwald camp," said CJC president Moshe Ronen.

Congress has written to Minister of Veterans Affairs Fred Mifflin urging the government to intervene on behalf of the servicemen. Although veterans can apply for compensation on their own, Germany "is usually slow in these matters... We've seen that when local governments intervene, things move a lot faster," Ronen said.

Allied servicemen from Britain, the United States, Australia and New Zealand have received compensation in the past two years. "Canadian veterans played a role in the defeat of the Nazi horror and the honorable thing would be to treat them with equity compared to other servicemen," Ronen said.

The fate of captured Canadian servicemen imprisoned in Buchenwald has been well known for some time, Ronen said. A National Film Board documentary, The Lucky Ones: Allied Airmen and Buchenwald was broadcast on the Arts & Entertainment Network in January and a Senate subcommittee on veterans' affairs heard submissions on the topic in 1990. Twenty-six Canadian soldiers were sent to Buchenwald.

Because of the Jewish community's experience during the war, it is in a position to speak out with some moral force on the fate of the Canadian servicemen, he added.

Landy is concerned over TV broadcasts

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Keith Landy, new Ontario Region chair, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), has expressed concern that messianic TV broadcasts will attempt to convert Jews to Christianity.

"It appears that the American model will also happen here," said Landy at a breakfast meeting of CJC's community relations committee.

His comment followed a review of the situation in the United States by Ottawa-born Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein of Chicago, an expert on the Christian evangelical movement.

Rabbi Eckstein visited Toronto to discuss with Congress officials the recent granting of a Canadian licence for a Christian TV station.

As founder and president of the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, Rabbi Eckstein defended the right of the evangelicals to air their views on TV, but said he would draw the line at those who target Jews for conversion.

He said he was not able to get agreement that these TV evangelical shows would not allow messianic Jews on air, but did get agreement that such Jews would not urge others to follow in their wake.

One group who violated this rule apologized to him that the TV host did not know that this would happen.

Evangelical membership in the United States has grown to one-third of the total Christian community, he said. But the factions who target Jews for conversion represent only one-half of one percent.

Speaking of the controversy over the City of David messianic synagogue in the north Bathurst Street area, he said, "We faced this situation 15 or 20 years ago in Chicago and other cities."

Prayer program

More than 42 percent of the U.S. population watch TV evangelical preachers such as Jerry Falwell, Billy Graham, Pat Robertson, Jim Dobson and Gary Power, he said.

Though there were some attempts on the part of right-wing religious Jews and evangelical fundamentalists in the United States to cooperate in promoting a school prayer program, these attempts petered out, he said.

Rabbi Eckstein said he supports the evangelical groups Bridges for Peace and the Christian Embassy. The latter raised $12 million to transport Jews from the former Soviet Union to Israel, or to help elderly Jews there.

Tolerance of the evangelical community by Jews is required considering the number of Righteous Gentiles who saved Jewish lives, he said.

Ontario govt. accused of age discrimination

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario government has adopted a discriminatory "ageism" policy denying the services of an attendant to people over 70, while granting it to younger disabled and accident victims, charged Patricia Spindel, a professor of social services at Humber College.

"If you were being told that you were not entitled to the level of attendant care that many other people are getting because you are Jewish, or East Indian, or because you are a woman, there would be outrage. But it can be denied you because you are over 70, and that too is an outrage. Ageism is just as insidious and destructive as anti-Semitism, racism and misogyny," Spindel told some 150 people attending a seminar sponsored by the Association of Jewish Seniors (AJS) and the Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens' Organizations (OSCO).

In response, the group meeting at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue adopted a report calling for attendant care to allow a home-bound older adult to go shopping or to a park, as a replacement for the present home care program in which nurses will visit, but only for medical reasons.

The group also called for non-profit nursing homes to be given equal privileges with private nursing homes run for profit, and for a reversal of the policy of privatizing health services.

It asked the Ontario government to avoid "managed care" for seniors based on models in the United States.

The root of the problems, Spindel said, is that aging has been redefined as a disease, putting older people in what she called the industrial-medical complex.

This has led to corporations building or acquiring nursing homes as a business. "Nursing home licences, once awarded, can be sold to the highest bidder, usually at a rate of $35,000 to $50,000 per bed; so a 200-bed nursing home licence can be sold for $10 million," Spindel said.

The government should build an attendant care system for seniors from money in its health budget, a system which is not biomedical in nature, to be delivered to their own homes, non-profit apartments or small, six-bed or less, non-profit group homes, she suggested.

Also the government should fund 400 new adult protective services worker positions for seniors.

She asked the seminar to file a complaint with the Ontario Human Rights Commission that old people are being warehoused in Ontario because of ageist stereotypes. The Ministry of Health should be asked under freedom of information legislation, how nursing home bed licences are awarded and how much they go for on the open market.

Jewish youth explain how JF&CS helped in their lives

By RON CSILLAG

TORONTO — Shannon, who sports magenta hair, has spent over one third of her 15 years in foster care, four of those as a Crown ward. She was four or five when her mother became addicted to crack and cocaine, and eight when her mother took off, leaving Shannon with a cousin. For the next seven years, the girl was shunted from her mother to the cousin, to a foster mother, who used to be her volunteer Big Sister.

Today, Shannon is a poised, articulate young woman, who is completing high school and leads a stable life. She is proud of having had a bat mitzvah. And she owes it all to Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), whose care she is under. "The best part of JF&CS," she says, "is how secure it makes me feel."

Rob grew up amid drug dealers and thugs in a Toronto housing project. Bounced from foster homes to group homes, he wound up in a shelter after running away, and then, in youth detention after he threatened his foster mother. Now a confident 20, he's "connected" with a new JF&CS social worker, is finishing high school and living on his own. Recently, he was chosen to go to Israel on a student trip. "JF&CS helped me make it in life," he says.

Tali came under the care of JF&CS three years ago, when she was 15 – "wild and ready to shock." But with support and loving foster parents, she now lives independently, works full time and is completing school. "You gave me a chance to be all I can be," she says of the agency. "You made me feel wanted."

The three Jewish youths recounted their stories at JF&CS's recent annual meeting, as a way of showcasing the agency's work with youth in its care.

According to the JF&CS annual report, Shannon, Rob and Tali were among 114 Jewish youths and children in the agency's care over the past year, for a total of 28,000 days.

JF&CS became an accredited Children's Aid Society in 1980.

Agency president Richard Cummings cited a recent Ontario study which found that fully 33 percent of adult males and 20 percent of adult females report having experienced childhood physical abuse. The same study found that four percent of men and 13 percent of women report childhood sexual abuse.

Over the past year, JF&CS investigated 445 allegations of child abuse or neglect.

Also over the past year, the agency served 2,760 individuals or families; distributed $1.37 million in financial assistance to Jews in poverty; and aided 300 abused women, who received crisis services, counselling, support, and advocacy.

JF&CS reported a balanced budget, at just over $8.8 million.

But the agency says that due to government cutbacks, it is "unlikely" there will be any major spending increases.

While funding from governments and the United Way may stay constant, recent cutbacks and rising demand for services "will result in our inability to meet our clients' needs and to maintain the quality of services. The fact that our funding may at best stay steady does not bring a great deal of comfort to us.

"We need to find new sources of revenue to meet the increasing demand for services."

JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe paid tribute to Avraham Friedman for his 25 years of service as a social worker at the agency.

Children's centres honor 19 Toronto couples

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dvora, 14, came to Israel from Ethiopia on Operation Solomon. Erez, also 14, is a sabra whose father lost a leg in Operation Lebanon. Margarita, 9, came from Moldavia, and now lives in Ashdod. Abudi, 11 is a Bedouin who lives in Rahat, near Beersheva.

What they have in common is their love for tennis and their time spent at the Canada-Israel Children's Centres, formerly known as the Israel Tennis Centres.

The centres, which were founded 21 years ago, not only teach Jewish, Arab and Christian youngsters how to play tennis, but give those from less-than-ideal home situations, and those who are mentally and physically challenged, a place to meet other kids, "that little bit of extra, a chance to relax and enjoy fresh air, where people understand that your life is difficult," according to Leah Rabin, widow of assassinated Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Leah Rabin was the keynote speaker at a gala tribute evening of the Canada-Israel Children's Centres, held last week at Inn on the Park. The centres were a particular interest of both her and her husband, and she has continued the association.

She cut the ribbon at the opening of the first centre, at Ramot Hasharon. (There are now nine centres from Kiryat Shmonah in the north, down to Beersheva, Ofakim and Arad in the Negev.)

The word "tennis" in the original name of the organization had a negative connotation, Rabin said. "People thought, 'You've solved all your problems, so I need to give my money for tennis?'"

In fact, she said, Israeli children need it more than others, because of the enormous pressure the society is under.

When they are bused to the centres, she said, they experience equality "of uniform, rackets, and the opportunity of maybe becoming a tennis star."

This is not a luxury or a frivolity, Rabin insisted, adding that "in Israel, nothing is a luxury."

Coming to the centres helps the children integrate into Israeli culture and develop self esteem, pride, loyalty and comradeship, she said.

On a more sombre note, she said she is worried that "today's young people, who grew up with a State of Israel, don't understand the meaning of a Jewish homeland – how important, how vital, how significant a change it is."

Since the United Nations passed the resolution accepting the establishment of a Jewish state in 1947, "we have worked hard, building a country and fighting for survival."

But survival, she said, is not enough. "We want to live significant, interesting lives."

This includes, she said, fulfilling the "moral target and moral code" of Ki MiTzion Tetsay Torah (from out of Zion shall come the Torah) and the Ten Commandments.

At the event, the Canada-Israel Children's Centre Peace Prize was presented to 19 couples who have been active in the cause for many years. Each couple received a sculpture cast in Israel by Toronto developer and sculptor Al Green. Rabin received the artist's proof copy.

Master of ceremonies Monty Hall told the nearly 1,000 people at the dinner that the $1 million goal had been reached. The proceeds will establish five new programs, dealing with Arab-Jewish coexistence; hearing impaired, developmentally challenged and autistic children; computer learning; a science museum project; and art learning programs.

"This crisis really expresses itself on various levels. There's the economic crisis: the economy is in recession and unemployment is constantly rising. Of course, you are aware of the polarization [between] the extreme religious and the secular." And there's a prevailing tension – "the tension of not knowing where we are actually going with the peace process. So altogether, these aren't easy days."

The seeds of peace planted by her husband and others have taken root, however.

"The reality of peace is already there to a large extent. I mean, we are not back to point one. There are all kinds of dialogues between Israelis and Palestinians. There is something going on all the time. It is not a total stalemate."

For two years, hopes of peace and cooperation were high. Now, Rabin blames the government for promoting "suspicion" against Palestinians.

"It seems not to trust, not to have faith, telling the people of Israel, 'Don't trust the Palestinians. They don't want peace.' We are being told how dangerous the Palestinians are.

"My answer is that Israel has proven its military strength against the mighty powers of the Middle East. Having proven our military might time and again, and shown we are indestructible on the battlefield, how can anybody tell us that Palestinians are a threat?"

But in the meantime, Netanyahu – "in a very demagogic way" – is stuck on percentages of the West Bank to cede to the Palestinian Authority. "Two percent here or there have no meaning whatsoever," Rabin states. "It is much more a question of principle. What are we doing? Are we on our way to solving the conflict, or are we struggling with every percentage in order to…what? To defend Israel? From whom?"

She does not discount acts of terror. "But terror belongs to fundamentalist groups. You will never convince me that Arafat was interested in [suicide bombs]. He wants peace. Is he interested in the disruption of it and the destruction of it?"

Tragic irony

There was a detached almost dulled sense of ennui to the story that came across the news wire services last week. "Aid agencies ferried casualties from devastated villages in northern Afghanistan and appealed for more aircraft and fuel to rescue uncounted others," read the first paragraph of a two-paragraph item.

The story was a short follow-up to the important but underreported news of the two previous days. An earthquake had struck a remote region of northeastern Afghanistan. The initial quake and the aftershocks killed perhaps as many as 5,000 people. As of this writing, the final toll is unknown and international aid agencies were still struggling to bring out all the wounded, most of whom were small children and the elderly, and to bring in sufficient emergency supplies.

It should be noted that Canada and Israel have both contributed to the international aid effort. It is especially noteworthy that Israel has done so in light of the fact that it has no official ties with Afghanistan, a Muslim state.

Little reported about the tragedy, if not little noticed, is the fact that the shifting of the rock plates deep inside the inner earth of Afghanistan occurred merely days after Pakistan tested six underground nuclear devices. And of course, Pakistan tested its devices merely days after India had tested five underground nuclear bombs.

Afghanistan, Pakistan and India are neighbors; they share borders, and a common geography.

Is it not conceivable therefore, in the same way that effect is tied to cause, that the earthquake in Afghanistan was tied to the underground explosion of 11 nuclear devices within a two-week period inside the same geographic region?

Afghanistan and Pakistan though, share more than geography; they also share a religion.

If indeed, the earthquake resulted from the nuclear testing, how tragically ironic and pitiably sad that a matter of hours after the crowds in the street, the minions in their offices, and the decision-makers in high government places celebrated the successful testing of an "Islamic bomb," thousands of their co-religionists were crushed and smothered under the suffocating, crumbling clay. Scores more were injured, displaced from their homes, searching for food, medicine and shelter, truly, the wretched of a quaking earth.

And if the deaths and the misery were caused by the acts of man, what a terrible price man's vanity demanded.

A strange display

Canadians last week witnessed a strange display of political expedience. On two consecutive evenings, first in Quebec City and then in Edmonton, the Reform party and the Bloc Québécois held public dialogues on the future of the country. The parties were ostensibly exchanging views as a result of the Reform party's public announcement the week before that it was searching for a united alternative to the ruling Liberal government.

The meetings were arranged with the full blessings of Preston Manning, Gilles Duceppe and Lucien Bouchard, the acknowledged real leader of the separatist forces. For the separatists the meetings were a success. They demonstrated their willingness to negotiate the break-up of the country with anyone who will meet with them.

For the Reformers, on the other hand, the meetings represent something of a low-water mark. So desperate is their desire to oust the governing federal Liberals, that they seek common ground with the party whose first principle, first cause and first loyalty is the dismantling of Canada. We were heartened to read that many Reform stalwarts themselves were also bothered by the meetings.

Navy officer did not experience anti-Jewish bias

Re: your story on Andrew Liebmann (CJN, April 30). I am Jewish, and I retired from the Canadian Forces in 1983 after 26 years of service, both in the ranks and as an officer. During my tenure in the Forces (Navy), I never experienced any anti-Jewish bias of any sort.

If anything, the Forces often went out of their way to ensure that I did not suffer any problems arising from religious concerns.

I fully support the Forces' decision not to let Liebmann serve in a sensitive area because of his religious background. If a Jewish serviceman were to fall into the hands of an enemy known to be anti-Jewish for whatever reason, the pressures on that person's superiors would be unduly increased, as compared to the case where it is a serviceman of any other religion. In order words, allowing the Jewish serviceman to serve in the Middle East might have brought undue pressures, both military and political upon others who did not deserve it. It is not religious discrimination or bias; it is sheer common sense.

I myself was restricted from serving in a Middle East posting, and fully concurred with this decision, which was discussed freely with me.

Levine appointment violated democracy

Your editorial of May 28 shows ignorance of the situation and hypocrisy. Although David Levine's support of the separatists is a factor, the basic issue is democracy. The selection committee did not follow the procedure laid out in their rules. The final group of candidates were, according to their rules, to be submitted to the whole board. They were not. The board has infuriated the populace by the way it treated them after inviting them to a meeting for a dialogue. The board never responded to any questions, and that infuriated everyone.

The residents of the Ottawa area welcome on average 50,000 Quebecers daily to work in Ontario, even though Quebec has many restrictions on our working there. Many of them are separatists and work here with impunity. It is easy for you to make comments from Toronto when we are on the firing line. We have tongue troopers running around all our hospitals in the area to ensure there is adequate French available. These tongue troopers have a budget of $715,000 that could have been used by a health care system that is so short of funding.

The hypocrisy in your words, "betraying Canada," is your failure to condemn real human rights situations, such as Jean-Louis Roux being forced to resign as lieutenant governor of Quebec, even though his flirtation with the fascists occurred over 50 years ago. It is pathetic to see you spouting "freedoms and the law" when it suits you and ignoring it when it does not. That is hypocrisy.

Help survivors before it's too late

Since 1993, Holocaust survivors who have not received any compensation from the German government, and who are facing financial hardship, have been and still are being encouraged to apply for restitution under Article 2 of the Hardship Fund. The German government set up this fund following the unification of East and West Germany.

While appearing to be caring and willing to help needy survivors, the criteria for eligibility eliminate most of them from receiving it. Hungarian survivors are especially discriminated against because Hungary was not occupied by the Germans for more than 11 months, March 1944 to April 1945. During those 11 months, most of the Jews in Hungary were sent off to the concentration camps for extermination, and hardship was inflicted on those who were in hiding and survived. This is not taken into consideration by the German government. The criteria stipulate that only those who were under direct occupation for 18 months qualify. This formula for eligibility is wrong and must be changed. All survivors, because of their suffering, should be entitled to restitution regardless of time under occupation or financial circumstances.

These changes must be brought about while survivors are still alive. Most of them are old and sick, and soon it may be too late to help them.

Israel not cause of Arab problems

As a Holocaust survivor, I, better than many, understand the meaning of cruelty and deprivation. I can commiserate with the suffering of fellow human beings, regardless of their religious or political affiliations.

The Arabs of former Palestine should and will eventually obtain some kind of self-dependence and self-government, but first they must show that they can live in peace with Israel and can control the violent element. As for the charges that Israel is the cause of their displacement and that Israel seized their lands unjustly, the facts do not bear these charges out.

The 1948 partition of Palestine was accepted by Israel and rejected by the Arabs. The Arab population was encouraged to leave their homes on the promise that they would return in triumph and enrich themselves at the cost of the defeated Jewish population. The combined Arab armies attacked Israel and failed to "drive them into the seas" as promised, thus creating a "new" status quo. All the misfortunes faced by the Palestinians were therefore self-inflicted. The creation of the refugee camps followed, and no meaningful assistance was given to the Palestinians by their allies and brethren. No amount of rhetoric can change these facts.

Both parties to the conflict must pragmatically resolve the conflict, alleviating a situation which is potentially very dangerous.

Peace now is the only viable solution. A secure Israel and a peaceful Palestine living side by side could thrive and prosper, thus defusing this Middle East tinder box.

There are absolute standards

By RABBI MARVIN B. PACHINO

The face of North American society, not to speak of the face of the world, is very different today from what it was 40 years ago. Indeed, the morals and mores of society today are different from what they were five or 10 years ago. Working and interacting with teenagers day in and day out for the last 25 years, have brought this home very forcefully. Teenagers are on the cutting edge of social change and are ready, and generally uncritical, customers of that which is new or different.

Someone once observed that the young generally tend to extol that which is new and modern, simply because it is new and modern. The older generation, on the other hand, leans to the other extreme, inclines towards more conservative views, and is not comfortable with change or new socio-cultural phenomena.

The challenge is to somehow bridge the extremes and create a balance. We have to recognize that everything new or modern is not necessarily good or virtuous. At the same time, the good old days and the good old ways do not merit our unquestioning homage. We have to know when, and how, to refresh and revitalize the old, but we have to be able, as well, to root the new in the soil of history and tradition from which it can draw abiding meaning and significance.

This is what authentic Jewish education in its broadest sense is about: blending the old and the new, synthesizing past and present, to fashion a meaningful future that bespeaks a genuine Jewish world view.

This is by no means an easy task, because the value system that informed North American society 40 or 50 years ago has virtually collapsed and the Jewish educational system, both formal and informal, in the school and within the family, must confront that collapse head-on. That means we have to be judgmental at times, in an era and in a culture where that is frowned upon.

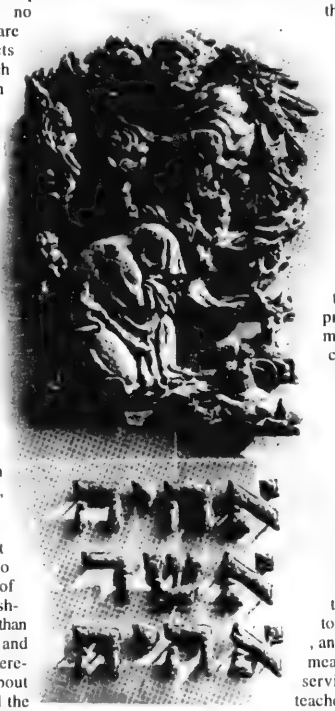
The modern culture discourages strong convictions about what is right or what is wrong, what is good or what is evil. It is maintained that all such concepts are relative, at best, and irrelevant at worst. Yet this is precisely what Judaism is all about: having strong beliefs, making value judgments and acting upon them.

And this is what Jewish education is all about: inculcating a value system, teaching that there are absolute standards, and transmitting the knowledge and the skills required to distinguish between right and wrong, good and evil.

In this context, Jewish education must be seen as not exclusively the province of the Jewish school and its professionals. Rather, it is the domain and sacred responsibility of every Jewish family and all of the legitimate institutions of a Jewish community. If Jewish education is not seen from this perspective, it will lose its relevance, and authentic Jewish living will be consigned to the dustbin of history.

Simply stated, parents who send their children to Jewish schools with the expectation that the schools will "make their children Jewish," and will instil in them commitments and loyalties to Jewish values and Jewish communal duties, are deluding themselves.

Children must witness in the lives of their parents the creative tension of honestly reconciling the old and the new, tradition and modernity. They must be involved in that struggle themselves and perceive it as a noble privilege, worthy of the dilemmas and the conflicts that it produces.



The author's call for our adherence to absolute standards finds powerful visual expression in the famous rendition of Moses with the Tablets of the Law by Rembrandt, above, and in Milton Horn's depiction of Moses before the Burning Bush.

And make no mistake! There are serious conflicts because there is much about the society in which we live that runs counter to the values of Judaism. The coarse and vulgar are accepted as fashionable today. Refinements of language and behavior appear to have been abandoned to the point where we have lost the ability to discriminate between that which is proper or improper, right or wrong.

This is more than a clash between the old and the new, the conservative and the liberal, although many view it just that way. This goes to the very core of Judaism and Jewishness, which is more than simply folkways and customs and ceremonies. This is about God and man, and the meaning of life. It is about the Jew and the duties that being Jewish impose upon us. It is about being moral and ethical human beings as defined by the absolute principles of God's Torah, and being a "light unto the nations," an example of godly living for others to emulate.

Today, these kinds of statements cause people to be uncomfortable because they imply the surrender of autonomy, which is the god of hedonistic culture, and because they imply the need to allow Judaism to shape and guide our lives. But what is the alternative? To paraphrase: "To exchange one's birthright for a mess of pottage may not be the most honorable thing to do. But to exchange one's birthright just for a mess is far more reprehensible."

These have to be the concerns of Jewish education. Not only must our students be inspired not to exchange their Jewishness for the moral mess that characterizes society today, they must be imbued with the mission to contribute to cleaning up the mess.

Not that it was ever easy, but the task is quite a bit different today from what it was when I began my career. The collapse of the moral consensus, which I mentioned above, has altered the field. In a book on ecological economics entitled Small is Beautiful, by E.F. Schumacher, the following passage appears: "Call a thing immoral or ugly, soul-destroying or a degradation of man, a peril to the peace of the world or to the well-being of future generations. As long as you have not shown it to be 'uneconomic,' you have not really questioned its right to exist, grow and prosper."

This is the climate in which we have to educate Jews today and help them find their authenticity as Jews by infusing their lives with authentic Jewish content. To achieve this, we need teachers who are steeped in Jewish learning, who possess the skills to relate to the realities of their students' lives, and who are able to guide them towards an enthusiastic identification with the values of our heritage.

Unfortunately, the community is producing very few men and women who can fill this bill and, what is worse, the community does not seem to care. Every major industry allocates funds and engages personnel to do research, but the Jewish community is not allocating the resources for the development of effective curricula, the training of personnel to deliver the curricula, and the organization of meaningful, ongoing in-service programs for teachers in the classroom. Quite the contrary, the Jewish community is seeking ways to reduce its financial commitments to Jewish education.

Furthermore, the community has made sure that an independent advocacy voice for Jewish education will not exist, so that it will not have to answer the tough questions that would otherwise be raised as it goes along its merry, imperialistic way.

We assiduously avoid confronting the fact that if the Jewish community and its communal institutions are mere imitations of the general culture and mores, then they too will be Jewishly irrelevant and will have no claim upon Jews for their support and their perpetuation.

The manner in which the Jewish community musters its intellectual and material resources to preserve its birthright and to define itself by the true principles of our heritage will determine its face 40 years from now. Or will it become faceless as it assimilates into the crass culture of the majority?

Rabbi Pachino is retiring this summer after 40 years of professional activity in the Jewish community, the last 19 years as headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Today's column is the last column that will appear in this space, which is reserved for student writers. Having graduated, I no longer qualify. So, here goes...

By Viva Press in Halifax

I'm doing the Europe thing... well, sort of. During my four years at university, I put off seeing Europe (except for England and Italy), because I didn't have the time I felt was needed to see the different countries. I still don't.

When I say the "Europe thing," I'm referring to the many students and/or recent graduates who travel throughout Europe for approximately six weeks, stopping in at least 10 places. These pit stops don't interest me. That's not saying this way of travel is bad – it's just not for me.

I like to spend some time in a place and get a feel for the local way of life. When I went to Italy three years ago, I spent four weeks in Florence alone. I really got a sense of the way of life: I had my favorite fruit and vegetable market; I had my favourite ice cream store. I felt like more than just a tourist passing through.

Because of time restrictions, I realize that I won't get to know Budapest, Prague and Amsterdam the way I knew Florence, but I hope the week I've allotted to each place will at least leave me with a feel of what local life is like. I admit that even this plan is a little rushed, but as the often over-quoted saying goes: If not now, when?

It's funny how people, upon hearing where I'm off to, feel the need to tell me stories of being robbed in each of the places. I sometimes wonder if these people expect me to change my travel plans because of an incident their sister's friend's brother experienced on his travels. Okay, perhaps I'm being a little too harsh. I know these people are just trying to alert me to the dangers that exist out there, but sometimes it is done too well. I have my "hidden" money belt, my travellers cheques, my plane ticket, and my Ventolin (I'm asthmatic). I'm ready to travel.

Oh yeah, I'm going alone. Travelling solo isn't for everyone. I prefer it because I only have to compromise with myself as to what I want to do and see. Also, there's no need to wait for someone else to take time off from work or school. And as for meeting people, there is almost never a problem; summer in Europe guarantees other packers.

So, I'm off to Europe. I'm going to photograph and check out three new places. And I'm pretty excited.

When I began writing for The CJN, I had just made the move from Toronto to Halifax. It is only fitting, then, that as I relinquish this space to another student, I'm on the move again.

I hope everyone has a great summer. Thanks again for reading this column.

STOPPING TO PRAY

Holocaust memorial in Berlin

For many Jews, it is hard to acknowledge the fact that the Germany of today is vastly different from the land that systematically murdered six million of our people. But fortunately it is a fact that the nation that produced Hitler and his madness has also squarely confronted its past and is anxious to present a new face, not only to the outside world, but to its own citizens.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Still, many Jews are dubious, and very often I am asked whether, in fact, the pronouncements of German leaders are nothing more than statements expected from them, rather than true and tested signs of a new direction. They point to the discovery of neo-Nazis in the German army or to the debacle of the Holocaust memorial that was planned for Berlin. The project provided for a cement slab the size of a football field, on which millions of names were to be inscribed.

As I reported in a column some time ago, this plan was dropped, not because it represented the Holocaust presence in Berlin, but because a slab of stone however large was by itself not expressive of the idea of memory and repentance.

Even such a vocal advocate for a suitable memorial as Nobel prize winner Guenter Grass wrote an open letter to the committee in charge. He thought Berlin was too anonymous a city, and instead suggested places such as Sachsenhausen, where one of Germany's concentration camps was located, or Wannsee in Berlin's suburban area where Rudolf Heydrich conducted the infamous Wannsee Conference on Jan. 20, 1942. That was the place where the Holocaust achieved official approval and thereafter was systematically carried out.

I happen to agree that the original plan for a memorial was mistaken, but I think Grass and company are in error as well. Berlin is going to be the new unified capital of Germany where all government operations will take place, and it is a city of worldwide cultural and historic interest. It is in the capital that a memorial should be erected.

If the original design was inappropriate, the place that was set aside for it is the best that one can hope for – between Berlin's landmark (the Brandenburger Tor) and its major square (Potstamer Platz). As I understand it, the new memorial competition has come down to a short list and sometime soon a final decision should be made.

I respect the integrity of Guenter Grass, but I'm afraid that by suggesting that the Berlin location be scrapped altogether and a new location found, he has given unwitting support to those who would like nothing better than to have the memorial either abandoned altogether or moved to a place where relatively few people would visit it.

Holocaust denial is a crime in Germany, but that does not mean that privately there are no Holocaust deniers around. Further delay would only give them more room to raise their objections, and therefore, I for one think that the sooner a design is approved and located in the centre of Berlin, the better for the memory of those that are no more.

It's time to say goodbye

The other day I went for a walk with my pal Ringo. As we enjoyed the warming heat of the summer sun, Ringo encouraged me to ponder the intrinsic value of team work. I realized that walking together made us, in a sense, a team, and by virtue of the fact that we were a team, we each reaped benefits that would have been lacking had we been by ourselves.

By Justin Korda in Montreal

In any goal we strive towards or any activity we undertake, team work can exponentially increase our productivity. The success of the accomplishment of a team may be greater than that of an individual, and the satisfaction may also be increased, because celebrating as a team is obviously more meaningful – and fun – than celebrating alone.

Over the past year and half I have had the amazing opportunity of sharing my views with you in The Canadian Jewish News. I have attempted to raise many issues, ranging from Jewish student activism to U2's Pop Mart tour. With every experience I have recounted, I have been fortunate to be part of a team of people who subscribed to the beliefs being advocated and were intent on living them.

As this is my final article for the student voice column of the paper, I would like to acknowledge and thank the members of the teams that I have been a part of, for they are the ones who have inspired me in countless ways.

I am grateful to have been part of many different projects. I was privileged to have had the opportunity of networking with a broad range of students. Together we toiled and then celebrated the realization of shared dreams. I was honored to meet people who demonstrated their belief in students. Together we successfully created a relationship based on mutual experience and enthusiasm. I have been energized by my peers to pursue many ventures, and I thank my friends for sharing with me.

We all seek the attainment of our own personal missions, sometimes paying little attention to the procedure we use to reach our goals. In our pursuits, the real accomplishment comes when we stumble across other individuals who are on the same path, striving towards the same mission. This opens the door for people to join forces and interact with each other, using overlapping and shared interests to bring their dreams closer to realization. This applies to the smallest and most mundane interests as well as to the largest most monstrous concepts.

As a university student with somewhat irregular study habits, I have at times made it quite difficult for myself to learn certain lessons, but it has become obvious to me that with the end of every chapter, a new one begins, and that this can be seen on a symbolic level. Just as a good book seems never ending, so it is with the accomplishment of a goal or the asking of a question. The realization of any dream gives birth to new dreams, and the answer to a question will always lead to more questions. We must therefore continue to be challenged by our questions and charged by our dreams.

I submit my farewell to this great forum, and I look forward to joining forces with future teams, and striving towards new and higher endeavors.

Israeli insider dissects the Oslo negotiations

Five years ago in May, Uri Savir, then the director of Israel's Foreign Ministry, joined informal talks that had begun

By Sheldon Kirshner

several months earlier in Norway between two Israeli academics – Yair Hirschfeld and Ron Pundak – and three members of the PLO.

The talks had been arranged by Yossi Beilin, Israel's deputy foreign minister, and Terje Larsen, a Norwegian social scientist.

With Savir on board, the negotiations took a serious turn, culminating four months later with the historic Declaration of Principles (DoP), a document which changed the complexion of politics in Israel and the Middle East.

Signed and sealed at an internationally televised ceremony in Washington, the DoP officially launched a process that enabled Israel and its heretofore enemy, the PLO, to enter a new, albeit flawed, era of peacemaking.

Savir, a relatively young diplomat who had been press attache in Israel's embassy in Ottawa in the early 1970s, devoted the next three years to the talks, which yielded further agreements in 1994 and 1995, but also produced a degree of internal discord which rocked Israel to its core.

Savir, a fluent writer, describes these events in The Process (Random House), an intriguing book bound to take its place in the historiography of Arab-Israeli peace negotiations.

Savir's boss, Shimon Peres, then foreign minister, believed that Israel had no alternative but to deal directly with the PLO. As a result of the 1991 Madrid conference, Israel had started negotiations with a "non-PLO" Palestinian delegation consisting of Palestinians from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. But, as Israel learned, the Palestinians lacked a mandate to negotiate, and referred every point to the PLO leadership.

"We were engaged in a charade," Savir observes. "In Washington, we were actually negotiating with Yasser Arafat by fax!"

Fed up with the pace of the negotiations, Yitzhak Rabin, the prime minister, authorized Peres to bring Savir into the secret talks in Norway and to raise them to a higher and more practical level.

Facing Savir from the other side of the table was a Palestinian banker named Ahmed Qurei (Abu Ala), who instinctively understood the essence of the talks. "We have learned that our rejection (of Israel) will not bring us freedom," he said. "You can see that your control of us will not bring you security."

Savir agreed with Abu Ala's analysis, but realized that both sides, given the acrimonious past, would have to wage "bitter internal battles" for peace to succeed.

Rabin was initially skeptical of the Palestinian track, being more drawn to the concurrent peace process with Syria. But as time went on, he became a convert. Savir adds that Israel could not have attempted so controversial an undertaking had Rabin and Peres not put their strained relationship on a new footing.

For a long while, the talks were conducted clandestinely, virtually without the knowledge of the Israeli cabinet. A leak to the press would have sabotaged them, Savir claims. Eventually, about 100 people – 75 Israelis and Palestinians and 25 Americans, Egyptians, Moroccans, Tunisians and Russians – found out, faithfully keeping the secret until Kol Israel broke the story on Aug. 29, 1993.

The negotiations that climaxed with the DoP were like marathon chess games fraught with feints, bluffs and diversions, Savir notes. "The confrontations were often brutal, the crises close to shattering."

Each side made demands unpalatable to the other. Rabin insisted that Israel had to have overall security control, but herein lay a paradox. As Savir puts it: "Our problem was how to unburden ourselves of the occupation while continuing to protect our citizens..."

By contrast, the Palestinians fought for an acknowledgement of their national rights, some kind of status in east Jerusalem, a mechanism for the return of their refugees, a share in controlling the bridge joining the West Bank with Jordan, and the right to turn to outside arbitration. In methodical fashion, Savir explains how these obstacles were overcome.

During the first seven months of the process, the United States – the co-sponsor of the Madrid conference – placed little stock in the Oslo talks, Savir reveals. Washington hewed to the view that a breakthrough with Syria would be more likely, and strategically speaking, more valuable.

He claims that Arafat, whom Rabin reviled, misrepresented the DoP as a guarantee of Palestinian statehood according to a fixed timetable, ignored its details whenever possible, and was in no rush to implement it.

In any event, Savir discloses, the DoP was subjected to criticism by Gen. Ehud Barak, the chief of staff, who claimed that its security provisions were "riddled with holes."

No sooner had the DoP passed into history than Israel and the PLO commenced a fresh round of talks designed to push the process still further. According to Savir, the discussions began with a great gap in mutual perceptions. "For Israel the critical issue was security; for the Palestinians it was political and national pride."

The terrorism unleashed by the DoP prompted Israel and the Palestinians to commit repeated mistakes. Arafat failed to establish his authority by crushing Hamas, while Israel's closure policy punished the Palestinians rather than the purveyors of violence.

The rigorous talks which spawned the first Oslo accord in 1994 turned on one key matter: the dismantling of Israel's occupation of the territories under optimal conditions of security. These negotiations led Savir to the belated realization that Israel had cultivated "a self-serving myth" about the benevolency of its military occupation. "I did not know – and I think few other Israelis did – how thoroughly we had invaded the lives of our Palestinian neighbors."

To no one's surprise, the peace process generated apoplectic fits of rage among right-wing Israelis, and as the 1995 Olso 2 agreement reached its endgame, Savir was assigned a personal bodyguard. "My name," he writes coolly, "had appeared on a blacklist prepared by settlers in the territories."

Savir believes that the Israeli left, in the face of rising right-wing indignation, did not sufficiently stand up for the government.

In a further critique, Savir claims that Arafat failed to cultivate Israeli public opinion and was remiss in appreciating the dangers Islamic fundamentalism posed to Israel, the newly formed Palestine Authority and the peace process itself.

"The greatest weakness of the three-year negotiation effort was that its message did not filter enough down to the people," he concludes. "There was little talk of reconciliation, even less of the other side's predicaments."

In November 1996, Savir was appointed to head the ongoing negotiations with Syria which, until then, had been conducted by Israel's ambassador to the United Sates, Itamar Rabinovich. In The Process, Savir makes several telling observations about these talks.

Although Rabin never explicitly promised Hafez al-Assad the Golan Heights, he seemed ready to withdraw to the June 4, 1967 line in exchange for certain Syrian concessions. Assad, as it turned out, did not accept Rabin's demands.

Nevertheless, Israel and Syria reached a measure of progress on the nature of peace, water and economic relations. The real difficulties arose over security arrangements and the depth of a withdrawal.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Taking pride in Judaism

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

One of the most common dilemmas faced by Jews today is the tension between the claims of Judaism as a very particular and exclusive way of life, and the ethic of universal brotherhood that seems so taken for granted as the only perspective that is possible for an enlightened individual. Doesn't Judaism border on bigotry in its rhetoric about Jews as a "chosen people?" This is a serious question, and one that is especially important in contemporary Jewish education, where the ethic of relativism – that each culture is equally valid – informs the world view of many students.

The Torah's response to this issue is implied in the opening verses of Chapter 12 of Genesis. God commands Abraham to leave his "land" in Haran and move to Canaan. He is told not simply to leave his homeland, but also "his birthplace," and his "father's house," for all of these geographic areas designate a different allegiance and hence a different problem in severing connection with the past. First comes the problem of the "land," the national culture which defines much of who we are. Then there is one's "birthplace" (one's social framework, friends, associates). What will they think if I "go Jewish on them?" And, of course, "father's house" comes last of all, the Herculean task of rebelling against family traditions that may be utterly antithetical to living Judaism.

God wishes to remove Abraham from the environment in which he has been living and to place him in an entirely different reality, one where he can serve God free from the opposing value systems and ideas of his idol worshipping neighbors. And what is to be the result of this aggressively "anti-social" gesture, this flight by Abraham into a very particular way of life? We are told that God will make for Abraham a great nation, and that all who bless Abraham will be blessed, and all that curse him shall be cursed. But the truly striking part of God's promise follows directly after this, when Abraham is assured that as a result of this decision to flee his milieu, "all the families of the earth shall be blessed."

This is a seemingly odd comment by the text; after all, what is the connection between Abraham's pursuit of a very specific and non-universal lifestyle and the accumulation of blessing for all people, everywhere? Yet precisely here we see revealed Judaism's central teaching about the relationship between the particular and the universal, that is, that nothing can be accomplished in life without coming from a particular vantage point. No successful relationship with another human being is achievable unless one relates to the other from a specific and even different (but hopefully compatible) point of view. God tells Abraham that the pursuit of a particular way of life – given that it is carried out with intelligence, dignity and respect for others – ensures that not only will he benefit, but also that the world as a whole gains from this situation.

Judaism teaches that to take pride and actively engage in our tradition need not be a ticket to prejudice, but is rather a moral imperative. As we develop a solid identity as Jews, we can then meaningfully encounter other people, Jews and gentiles alike. In this way, we help to contribute to the diverse fabric of the world and give substance to the term universalism, which should not be a synonym for conformity, but rather a dialogue between rich and different points of view.

'It ain't necessarily so'

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

A little more than a decade ago, I invested $4 at a local Mormon family history library for a microfilmed reel of Jewish records (1846-1853) from my paternal ancestral town of Konin, Poland. It turned out to be one of the most rewarding investments I ever made.

It took a few years, but eventually I inspected all of Konin's Jewish civil records from 1808 to 1884. The microfilms yielded approximately 330 documents pertaining to my family. More family documents awaited in microfilms from neighboring towns.

The 19th-century civil registrations of Congress Poland were handwritten in Polish until 1867, and in Russian thereafter. The documents were largely standard and formulaic in their composition, varying minimally from town to town and from year to year.

As anyone knows who has ever compiled a 19th-century Polish-Jewish family tree, such documents are pieces of a complex jigsaw puzzle that can be fitted together to present a larger picture. Only through rigorous scrutiny do some of these documents relinquish their secrets and mysteries. The task of translation requires the genealogist to be a linguist, but the larger task of interpretation requires that he or she be a skilled detective.

In recent years, I have gone over my documents with the proverbial fine-tooth comb. I have translated them afresh, put them in chronological order, and carefully studied Hebrew signatures, discrepancies in ages, naming patterns and other elements. Amazingly, even after a decade, I can still labor through a midnight dreary, poring over these antique papers, and emerge with new insights, interrelationships and enigmas.

How, for example, does one account for the puzzling anomaly of a duplicated death record? The Konin record books contain two documents, dated some three weeks apart in February and March of 1852, that each purports to describe the death of a 6-year-old girl, Rodesz Hahn.

Mourners in 19th-century Poland were apparently spared the legal responsibility of appearing at the town hall within a set period of time to register a death. Fathers did indeed occasionally report the deaths of their own children and then sign the register, but such a painful duty was apparently not obligatory. The only requirement seemed to be that the death had to be reported by someone, and whoever reported it – family representative, neighbor, community official – had to declare that he was convinced "with one's own eyes" that the death had occurred.

If the girl's father, Ber Hahn, was present while one of the duplicated entries was made, he was almost certainly not present for both. How could he, as well as the clerk, have forgotten his earlier visit? Further, how could he claim to be 36 years old in one document and 40 in the other? From this instance, we may surmise that official registrars were not above freely "guesstimating" ages and otherwise fabricating information.

Apparently our ancestors often purposely mixed up the facts in the civil records. Their reasons? In some cases they wanted to confound the civil authorities responsible for the military draft. They were also superstitious and may have sought to confound the lurking angel of death by being inexact about their names, ages and number of children.

Age discrepancies are common in the civil records. Just like today, people then had egotistical reasons for lying about their ages. It's also probable that many people resented the onus of reporting on their domestic affairs and sought to intentionally mislead the powers that be. Telling little white lies might have been a sort of comic subterfuge, in an attempt to hoodwink a government administration that was not exactly benign in its dealings with them.

Experienced genealogists acknowledge that even when a "fact" is recorded in an official document, "it ain't necessarily so." Biographical details need to be corroborated and reinforced through multiple sources before they can be considered trustworthy.

From Generation To Generation.* A History of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital (Lesley Marrus Barsky, $40).

Now in its 75th year, Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital is a world leader in research and in compassionate and high-quality care of the sick. But questions abound. How was so much achieved in so short a time? How did a largely struggling and immigrant community overcome multiple barriers to create so outstanding an institution? Who were some of the prime players in the ongoing drama of creative planning and accomplishment? What was happening in Toronto over three-quarters of a century ago – in government and in academic life – to influence and make possible the birth and growth of Mount Sinai?

These are some of the questions that Lesley Marrus Barsky probes in this informative, well-written, superbly researched and copiously illustrated account.

From 1900 to 1921, the Jewish population of Toronto jumped from 3,000 to almost 35,000. These largely Eastern European newcomers cried out for medical care and attention. The health facilities open to them and catering to their specialized needs were meagre. Moreover Jewish doctors, victims of anti-Semitism, could not intern or attend patients in Toronto.

The author makes clear that Jews were not excluded during the years 1910 to 1940 from the University of Toronto medical school. "In fact, records show that the number of Jewish students at Toronto's medical school began to grow at an extraordinary rate once large-scale immigration got under way. In 1910, only two percent, and by 1932, over one-quarter of all medical students were Jewish, an astonishing figure at a time when Jews made up only seven percent of the city's population. As well, the academic performance of Jewish students during this period was exemplary, and thus gave little cause for systemic prejudice within the medical faculty."

The major problem, however, was that there were few or no internships available to Jews. Specialty training was also closed to them. A Jewish doctor who desired further medical education, had to go to Europe or the United States, an option few could afford.

What resulted was the establishment of a 33-bed maternity and convalescent hospital on Yorkville Avenue, largely through the incentives of a Jewish charitable women's group. A larger facility followed in 1953, and the new and impressive Mount Sinai Hospital of today in 1973. The Research Institute (later renamed the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute) was created in 1992.

The men and women who over the years made Mount Sinai possible, displayed dogged perseverance, unselfish concern for others and unusual and creative fundraising ability.

As to be expected in a history of this kind, there are numerous brief biographies of prominent physicians and their accomplishments, as well as descriptions of the innovative improvements over the years in the treatment and care of patients.

From the beginning, though Jewish in spirit, the hospital has been open to patients of all religions. Kosher and non-kosher kitchens have always been available for patients and staff.

A small jewel of a synagogue, capable of seating 40, flanked by stained-glass panels and tucked into the southeast corner of the main floor, was dedicated in October 1975. It contains a holy ark whose magnificent bronze sculptured doors, executed by Sorel Etrog, bear the Hebrew inscription from Jeremiah, "Heal us, O Lord and We Will Be Healed."

In 1995 the hospital was listed in the book, The Best Hospitals in America, as probably the best all around hospital in the country.

What about the future? The author is confident that despite attempts at government restructuring, it is certain that "the long tradition of optimism and determination that once drove the rugged individualists who began Mount Sinai Hospital will not soon be dispatched to the dust of history." Dedicated to uncompromising excellence and the will to prosper and flourish, Mount Sinai will remain a bastion of hope and healing.

Free graphics on the Internet

It's 2 a.m. The big essay is due tomorrow. And you're done.

Then you realize, you don't have that satellite photo of Israel and the Middle East. No need to panic! Just download the photo you need [ftp://ftp.virtual.co.il/pub1/graphics/clipart/mideast.gif].

There are hundreds of photos and pictures of Judaic symbols, portraits of Jewish leaders, maps and photographs available to you online. And best of all, many of these images are free. Today, I'll tell you where to find them. Then you can use them in a school project, spruce up your own Web site or create a coloring book for kids. And if you have a program like Print Shop, you can incorporate these Jewish images into greeting cards, newsletters, welcome home posters, brochures, calendars and much more.

While practically every graphics library has some stunning images, there definitely is garbage out there. So don't get discouraged if your hunt takes a while. For example, at CompuJudaica's Jewish Graphics area [http://www.zoots.com/cj/graphic.htm] you'll find photos of ancient Ketubot, sheet music for Havah Nagilah, a Chagall painting, some nice Star of David designs, and a (not very good) picture of Jerry Seinfeld and ex-girlfriend Shoshana Lonstein.

Still looking for that perfect graphic? The Gallery of Free Jewish Clip Art presents a simple yet stylish display of over 40 Judaic images [http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/Gallery/6844/]. Sometimes free Jewish art will appear in the most surprising places. A Norwegian site has over a dozen black and white images including a dreidel and five menorahs [http://www.stud.ntnu.no/studorg/laget/clipart/jewish/joedisk.html]. And don't miss Shamash: The Jewish Internet Consortium Graphics Library [http://www.shamash.org/computers/graphics/] or Virtual Jerusalem which boasts the largest collection of Hebrew and Jewish software on the Internet [http://www.software.virtual.co.il]. You can download free Windows and Macintosh software in addition to a generous supply of clip art, pictures of famous rabbis and Israeli photos such as the famous Rabin-Arafat handshake.

Some times the best things aren't free. If you can't find what you need at the free sites, you can purchase high quality commercial Judaic clips.

The large software creator and vendor Davka has several graphic collections for sale [http://www.davka.com/fntgraph.html]. YidPix [http://www.poplarsoft.com/dav_y1.htm#yidpix] is a Judaic add-on to the very popular graphics program Kid Pix.

If ever there was a master of truth in advertising it is Vladmir Pertsel. Pertsel has created a colorful map of Israel that you can download [ftp://www.zoots.com/library/jewh&i/ISRA_MAP.GIF]. But it seems he doesn't seem to want to vouch for its accuracy. He signs his work "Copyleft 1994. No Rights Reserved. No Responsibility Taken."

Next week, more Jewish Internet freebies.

Akim on the move, says world campaign chair

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Akim Israel, the National Association for the Habilitation of the Mentally Handicapped in Israel, provides housing, sheltered workshops, work placement, day care, schooling, respite care and social clubs for Israel's mentally disabled.

And new world campaign chair Allan Marks wants to make sure that the organization can continue its work.

The key word, Marks told The CJN on a recent fundraising trip to Canada, is not *re*habilitation, but *ha*bilitation – "Akim starts from whatever circumstances the person is in, and gives them as regular a lifestyle as is possible.

"This may not be the same as other people have, but it is as close as we can come."

For instance, he said, even if they can't work with a computer, they can enjoy the use of one. "It is one of the few things they will keep playing with for a relatively long time."

"Every Israeli knows Akim," he said. "Twenty years ago the main pushka in Israel was for Akim."

Marks grew up in a traditional household in Leeds, England. He played rugby at university, married, and worked as a pharmacist. He opened several drugstores before he sold them and became active in Jewish welfare: United Israel Appeal (called in England Israel United Appeal) and Lubavitch, among other causes.

Ten years ago, he and his wife, his in-laws, his children "and my dog Knaidel" made aliyah. In Israel he volunteered to work in the immigrant absorption process.

Eighteen months ago, he was approached by Friends of Akim, the group that worked to supplement money and services provided by various levels of government.

"They realized that they were going backwards," he explained, forced to deal with a huge funding deficit, and an aging membership.
